3-2005

Just Another Brother on the SCT?: What Justice Clarence Thomas Teaches Us About the Influence of Racial Identity

Angela Onwuachi-Willig
Boston University School of Law

Follow this and additional works at: https://scholarship.law.bu.edu/faculty_scholarship

Part of the Law and Race Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://scholarship.law.bu.edu/faculty_scholarship/317
Just Another Brother on the SCT?: What Justice Clarence Thomas Teaches Us About the Influence of Racial Identity

Angela Onwuachi-Willig
Just Another Brother on the SCT?: What Justice Clarence Thomas Teaches Us About the Influence of Racial Identity

Angela Onwuachi-Willig

Justice Clarence Thomas has generated the attention that most Justices receive only after they have retired. He has been boycotted by the National Bar Association, caricatured as a lawn jockey in Emerge Magazine, and protested by professors at an elite law school. As a general matter, Justice Thomas is viewed as a “non-race” man, a Justice with a jurisprudence that mirrors the Court’s most conservative white member, Justice Antonin Scalia—in other words, Justice Scalia in “blackface.”

This Article argues that, although Justice Thomas’s ideology differs from the liberalism that is more widely held by Blacks in the United States, such ideology is deeply grounded in black conservative thought, which has a “raced” history and foundation that are distinct from white conservatism. In so doing, this Article examines the development of black conservative thought in the United States; highlights pivotal experiences in Justice Thomas’s life that have shaped his racial identity; and explicates the development of Justice Thomas’s jurisprudence from a black, conservative perspective in cases concerning education and desegregation, affirmative action, and crime.

The title of this Article is inspired by the movie JUST ANOTHER GIRL ON THE I.R.T (Miramax Films 1993). The I.R.T. is a line of the New York City subway system. The movie gives the female perspective of growing up in black urban America. In many ways, it is the female version of John Singleton’s BOYZ N’ THE HOOD (Columbia Pictures 1991). Thomas’s story is, in a sense, a black justice’s story.

* Acting Professor, University of California, Davis, School of Law. aonwuachi@ucdavis.edu. J.D., University of Michigan Law School; B.A., Grinnell College. Thanks to Kathy Bergin, Andrea Bjorklund, Jacquelyn Bridgeman, Alan Brownstein, Miriam Cherry, Joel Dobris, Holly Doremus, Chris Elmendorf, James Forman, Scott Gerber, Bill Hing, Emily Houh, Elizabeth Joh, Kevin Johnson, Evelyn Lewis, Al Lin, Deborah Malamud, Rob Mikos, Reginald Oh, Alex Romain, Jessica Silbey, Stephen Smith, David Stras, Madhavi Sunder, George Varghes, Marty West, and Sherman Willis for their helpful comments. Dean Rex Perschbacher’s support has been generous and invaluable. My assistants Torre Fogel, Addisah Sherwood, and Sarah Wells and the staff of the law library, in particular Erin Murphy and Aaron Dailey, provided valuable assistance. Most importantly, I thank Jacob Willig-Onwuachi for his love and his enthusiasm for my idea and my children Elijah and Bethany for keeping me on my toes.
TABLE OF CONTENTS

INTRODUCTION

I. THE DEVELOPMENT OF BLACK CONSERVATIVE THOUGHT
   A. The History of Black Conservatism
   B. Today’s Black Conservatives

II. “BIRTH OF A “NATIONALIST”: HOW CLARENCE THOMAS BECAME BLACK AND RIGHT

III. BLACK ROBE, BLACK VOICE
   A. Crime
   B. Education/Desegregation
   C. Affirmative Action

CONCLUSION
INTRODUCTION

Serving as a United States Supreme Court Justice is one of the most coveted and respected jobs in the nation. Nevertheless, as with any job in the public eye, Supreme Court Justices are often subject to criticisms by many persons, both within and outside of the legal profession. Justice Clarence Thomas is no exception.

From the very day that Thomas was nominated to sit on the Court, he has been a subject of great interest for many and has been critiqued and opposed by individuals from all walks of life. In particular, the Justice’s intellectual abilities and competence as a jurist have been repeatedly and continually challenged. For example, Justice Thomas has been rumored to select clerks from the best law schools, to lean “especially heavily on them,” and to publish their draft opinions with “little embellishment.” Additionally, Justice Thomas has had his independence as a voter on the bench questioned, with the suggestion that he bases his votes on those of a colleague, Justice Antonin Scalia. Indeed, Justice Thomas has been referred to as “Scalia’s puppet,” “Scalia’s clone,” and even “Scalia’s

---

2 See William D. Bader & Roy M. Mersky, The First One Hundred and Eight Justices 1 (2004) (asserting that the United States Supreme Court “plays such an influential role in shaping legal thought and practice” that it warrants special study).

4 See Gerber, supra note 3, at 25 (asserting that “[t]he conventional wisdom about Justice Thomas’s first few years was that his opinions were shallow and poorly reasoned, he did little work, and he was a clone of conservative Justice Antonin Scalia with few ideas of his own”);

5 See John Greenya, Silent Justice: The Clarence Thomas Story 167 (2001) (detailing claims that, while on the D.C. Circuit, Thomas selected clerks from the best law schools and relied heavily on them and their writing).

6 Greenya, supra note 5, at 263 (quoting a commentator as stating, “Putting aside his political philosophy and his conservative credo, Justice Thomas doesn’t deserve to be on the Supreme Court. He doesn’t have the intellect to be a member of the Court, and that’s the reason, in my opinion, that you see Thomas voting with Scalia so often.”).

bitch.”

As a liberal black womanist, I initially ignored these comments about Justice Thomas. Ironically, a biography of the late Justice Thurgood Marshall—whose jurisprudence could not have been more different than Justice Thomas’s—would bring me to commit an act that I wing ideologue” and Justice Thomas as “his Pavlovian puppet . . . who doesn’t even try to create the impression that he’s thinking”); Paul P. DuPlessis, Opinion, California Letters Desk, June 1, 2001, at B16 (calling Antonin Scalia “the Supreme Court’s puppeteer” and Clarence Thomas “his puppet”). But see GREENYA, supra note 5, at 13 (referring to an instance in which one trial lawyer asserted, “[m]y theory is that Clarence Thomas is a ventriloquist, and that the puppet is Scalia”).

See, e.g., Ann D. Wilson, Opinion, Supreme Court Ruling Bad Joke, PALM BEACH POST, Dec. 17, 2000, at 4E (referring to “Justice Antonin Scalia [and] his unqualified clone, Clarence Thomas”); Carl Rowan, Justice Thomas Will Never “Come Home,” CHI. SUN TIMES, July 4, 1993 (stating that there is “no reason even to hope that [Justice Thomas] will ever be anything other than a clone of the most conservative justice, Antonin Scalia”).

GREENYA, supra note 5, at 12 (2001) (quotations omitted) (recounting a story in which Thomas was called “Scalia’s bitch”).

The term “womanist” is a synonym for black feminist or feminist of color. The American Heritage Dictionary now includes this new term in its volume, defining “womanist” as “[h]aving or expressing a belief in or respect for women and their talents and abilities beyond the boundaries of race and class.” AMERICAN HERITAGE DICTIONARY, DICTIONARY OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE 1978 (4th ed. 2000).

I use the term “liberal” or “liberalism” to refer to political liberalism. By “liberal,” I mean a person who actively believes that Government should support social reform within the system and favors the protection of civil liberties. A “liberal” may support programs such as affirmative action or welfare, unions, and strong regulation of business.

Justice Thurgood Marshall, the great-grandson of a slave, became the first black Supreme Court Justice in 1967. See BOB WOODWARD & SCOTT ARMSTRONG, THE BROTHER: INSIDE THE SUPREME COURT 47 (1979). At the time of Marshall’s appointment, President Lyndon B. Johnson asserted that appointing Marshall on the Supreme Court was “the right thing to do, the right time to do it, the right man and the right place.” See Kevin R. Johnson, On Appointment of a Latino/a to the Supreme Court, 13 BERKELEY LA RAZA L.J. 1, 3 (2002) (quotations omitted).

Along with his mentor Charles Hamilton Houston, the former Dean of Howard University School of Law (where Marshall graduated first in his class), Marshall developed a strategy for eliminating segregation in educational institutions. In 1954, the efforts of Marshall and Houston resulted in the landmark decision in Brown v Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954), which declared state-mandated segregation of public schools unconstitutional. By the time Marshall was appointed to the Supreme Court, he had won twenty-nine of the thirty-two cases he argued before the Court. See Mark Tushnet, A Tribute to Justice Thurgood Marshall, Lawyer Thurgood Marshall, 44 STAN. L. REV. 1277, 1277 (1992).
once thought was impossible: defend Justice Thomas.\textsuperscript{12} The biography included a statement made by Archibald Cox,\textsuperscript{13} the man whom Marshall had replaced as Solicitor General:

Marshall may not be very bright or hard-working but he deserves credit for picking the best law clerks in town.\textsuperscript{14}

As Juan Williams made clear in his book \textit{Thurgood Marshall: American Revolutionary}, like Justice Thomas, many “[w]hite lawyers in the top law firms and law schools[,] had never been convinced that [Marshall] was a \textsuperscript{12} In fact, I was reluctant to write this Article because of the reactions I thought it would elicit. Many of my friends think it blasphemous to suggest that something about the late Justice Marshall reminds me of Justice Thomas. The late Justice himself once said scornfully of the nominee with comparably little litigation experience, “Think of them comparing him [Justice Thomas] with me. . . . They think he’s as good as I am.” \textit{Juan Williams, Thurgood Marshall: American Revolutionary} 393–94 (1998) (detailing the life story of Thurgood Marshall the man, the attorney, and jurist). As I worked on this article, I became more terrified of being called, much like Justice Thomas has been called, a traitor to my race. \textit{See} Randall Kennedy, “Sellout”: The Problem of Betrayal in African American History (manuscript at 15, on file with author) (maintaining that “the problem with blacks deploying a rhetoric that accuses other blacks of being enemies engaged in racial betrayal is that such attacks are too powerful, too intimidating, too silencing” and that it “causes black thinkers and policymakers to censor themselves out of fear of suffering racial excommunication”); also Jacquelyn L. Bridgeman, \textit{Defining Ourselves for Ourselves}, 35 Seton Hall L. Rev. (forthcoming 2005) (manuscript at 6-10, on file with author) (same). Justice Thomas has been heavily criticized by several prominent members of the black community. For example, film director Spike Lee called the Justice a “‘handkerchief head, a chicken and biscuit-eating Uncle Tom.’” Elwood Watson, \textit{Guess What Came to American Politics—Contemporary Black Conservatism}, 29 J. Black Stud. 73 (Sept. 1998) (quoting J. Thorton, \textit{The X Factor}, U.S. News & World Report, Jul. 15, 1991, at 17).

\textsuperscript{13} Archibald Cox, a former law professor at Harvard, was also the first special prosecutor appointed to investigate Watergate. Former President Richard Nixon ordered the solicitor general to fire Cox after he requested access to secret White House tapes as part of his investigation. \textit{See} Woodward & Armstrong \textit{supra} note 11, at 287–88.

strong legal mind,”¹⁵ despite the fact that Marshall had won twenty-nine of the thirty-two cases he argued before the Court.¹⁶

Indeed, much like with Justice Thomas and Justice Scalia, some critics had openly wondered whether Justice Marshall was dependent on Justice Brennan in deciding how to vote in cases before the Supreme Court.¹⁷ In fact, as several authors have noted, Justice Marshall was privately referred to by law clerks as “Mr. Justice Brennan-Marshall.”¹⁸

¹⁵ Id. As Mark Tushnet of Georgetown University Law Center has noted: The April 21, 1989 cover of the conservative journal National Review captured a common view of Thurgood Marshall as a Supreme Court Justice: it showed him asleep on the bench. This view, that Marshall was a lazy Justice uninterested in the Court’s work, is rarely committed to print. In the journalistic book THE BRETHREN, authors Bob Woodward and Scott Armstrong report an incident that presents this view. According to Woodward and Armstrong, Justice Lewis Powell expressed incredulity that, in a brief conversation, Marshall had seemed to indicate that he did not know the details in one part of Marshall’s important dissenting opinion in San Antonio Independent School District v. Rodriguez. They also report the “joke” told around the Supreme Court building that the only time Justice Marshall saw Justice Potter Stewart was in the hallways as Stewart arrived late and Marshall left early. This view of Marshall is wrong and perhaps racist.

¹⁶ See supra note 11 and accompanying text; Tushnet, supra note 11, at 1277 (citing Andrew Rosenthal, Marshall Retires from High Court, N.Y. TIMES, June 28, 1991, at A1, A13) (asserting that Marshall was a great trial lawyer and appellate advocate). Additionally, in their book THE BRETHREN, Robert Woodward and Scott Armstrong depicted Justice Marshall as a man who failed to pay attention to cases during oral arguments, did not do his work, regularly watched television in the middle of the day, heavily depended on his law clerks in preparing for cases and writing opinions, and was more admired for cracking dirty jokes during obscenity cases than for his legal skills.

¹⁷ Williams, supra note 12, at 402 (quoting Terry Eastland as saying “Justice Thurgood Marshall will be lucky to rank somewhere in the middle of the 105 Supreme Court Justices who have served the United States. . . . [Justice Marshall consistently voted with Justice Brennan and] wrote few opinions of major significance, either for the Supreme Court or in dissent.”).

¹⁸ See Woodward & Armstrong supra note 11, at 48; see also Williams, supra
Later, after Justice Marshall retired from the Court, one writer would assert, “Marshall worked well with Justice William J. Brennan Jr. . . . But Brennan, a great justice by any standard, was the senior man in this partnership, and when they managed to forge liberal majorities, it was usually due to Brennan’s influence within the Supreme Court. It bears noting that Marshall is retiring a year after Brennan did.” 19 That same writer, Terry Eastland, would also declare that Marshall was “not an intellectual force.” 20

Thus, the question arises: what does it mean that the only two black Justices to sit on the Supreme Court, two Justices who could not be any more different, 21 have routinely had their intellectual abilities and individualism questioned in the same way? 22 Have both of these Justices

19 Terry Eastland, Editorial, BALT. SUN, July 1, 1991, at A9. Even Chief Justice Rehnquist has challenged Justice Marshall’s legal thinking abilities, once stating “I think he [Justice Marshall will] be thought of as a great legal advocate, but I don’t think he would have been thought of as a great legal thinker.” WILLIAMS, supra note 12, at 402.

20 Id. (quoting Terry Eastland, Editorial, BALT. SUN, July 1, 1991, at A9).

Professor Stephen Smith of the University of Virginia School of Law has argued that high rates of agreement are commonplace on the Supreme Court. For example, during the same term that Justices Thomas and Scalia agreed 93% of the time, President Clinton’s two appointees to the Court, Justices Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen G. Breyer, agreed 86% of the time. Also, in Justice Anthony M. Kennedy’s first term on the Court, he voted with Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist 93% of the time. As Professor Smith points out, however, Justice Breyer and Justice Kennedy are not “dismissed as mere ‘followers’ of Justice Ginsburg and the Chief Justice, respectively, despite their similarly high rates of agreement.” Smith, supra note 7, at 517; see also Scott P. Johnson & Robert M. Alexander, The Rehnquist Court and the Devolution of the Right to Privacy, 105 W. VA. L. REV. 621 (2003) (reviewing privacy cases between 1986 and 2000 and finding in cases in which Justices Rehnquist and Scalia sat together, that they (in addition to Thomas) voted together 100% of the time, and that Ginsburg, Breyer, and Stevens also voted together 100%).

been targets of the age-old stereotype that Blacks\textsuperscript{23} are lazy and incompetent and cannot think for themselves?\textsuperscript{24} Or, more directly, to what extent is Justice Thomas a victim of this form of racism?\textsuperscript{25}

\textit{RACE IN AMERICA} (1999) and discussing how the presumption of black incompetence worked to hurt Larry Mungin, the book’s protagonist, at his law firm); Donna Gill, \textit{Lawyers of Color: Encouraging Diversity}, CHI. LAW., July 1992, WESTLAW (A black partner stated “[m]inorities don’t come in with [a] presumption of competence. . . . They come in having to prove themselves.”).

\textsuperscript{23} Throughout this Article, I capitalize the word “Black” or “White” when used as a noun to describe a racialized group. I do not, however, capitalize the word “black” or “white” when used as an adjective. I prefer to use the term “Blacks” to the term “African Americans” because I find the term “Blacks” to be more inclusive. Additionally, “[i]t is more convenient to invoke the terminological differentiation between black and white than say, between African-American and Northern European-American, which would be necessary to maintain semantic symmetry between the two typologies.” Alex M. Johnson, Jr., \textit{Defending the Use of Quotas in Affirmative Action: Attacking Racism in the Nineties}, 1992 U. ILL. L. REV. 1043, 1073 (1992).

\textsuperscript{24} See, e.g., PAUL M. BARRETT, \textit{THE GOOD BLACK: A TRUE STORY OF RACE IN AMERICA} (1999) (describing the story of a black Harvard Law School graduate who sued his law firm for racial discrimination and how the majority opinion of the D.C. Circuit contained an underlying message that the young attorney was an unqualified black lawyer carried along by affirmative action); see also SHELBY STEELE, \textit{A DREAM DEFERRED: THE SECOND BETRAYAL OF BLACK FREEDOM IN AMERICA} 5 (1998) [hereinafter STEELE, A DREAM DEFERRED] (noting that he “heard a white female professional at a racially mixed table call Clarence Thomas an incompetent beneficiary of affirmative action”); SHELBY STEELE, \textit{THE CONTENT OF OUR CHARACTER} 133 (1990) [hereinafter STEELE, CONTENT OF OUR CHARACTER] (“The accusation black Americans have always lived with is that they are inferior – inferior simply because they are black. And this accusation has been too uniform, too ingrained in cultural imagery, too enforced by law, custom, and every form of power not to have left a mark.”).

\textsuperscript{25} Justice Thomas has argued the same. See Tony Mauro, \textit{Clerks: Minority Ranks Rise}, LEGAL TIMES, Oct. 16, 2000, at 10. As Journalist Tony Mauro reported, Justice Thomas proclaimed the following in response to a question concerning “criticism that he is a “clone” of Justice Antonin Scalia: ‘Because I am black, it is said automatically that Justice Scalia has to do my work for me. That goes with the turf. I understand that deal. It is interesting that I rarely see him, so he must have a chip in my brain and he controls me that way. But the fact is, no such cabal exists.’” Mauro also wrote that Justice Thomas was later asked if he continues to write his own opinions and “deadpanned, ‘No, Justice Scalia does.’” See Tony Mauro, supra at 10 (emphasis added).

In an article, Mark Tushnet argues that racism affected perceptions of Marshall as being intellectually unfit for the court. See generally Tushnet, supra note 15. For instance, in response to the argument about Marshall’s “overuse” of his clerks, Tushnet demonstrates that Marshall’s “practices were not wildly out of line with those of others on the Court.” \textit{Id.} at 2112. Specifically, Tushnet reported:
A review of Justice Thomas’s jurisprudence reveals that there is no basis for the claim that Justice Thomas is a “Scalia clone” or “Scalia puppet” and supports the proposition that Justice Thomas has been unfairly subject to the stereotype of black incompetence. In fact, Justice Thomas has developed his own jurisprudence as a black conservative, directly and indirectly weaving his own “raced” ideologies into his opinions.

In this Article, I draw on Justice Thomas’s opinions on the Supreme Court in areas concerning education and desegregation, affirmative action, and crime to argue that Justice Thomas’s

Chief Justice William Rehnquist has written that he has his clerks “do the first draft of almost all cases” in his chambers, and that sometimes he leaves those drafts “relatively unchanged.” Laurence Tribe reported that “a number of opinions he worked on” as Justice Stewart’s law clerk “are really almost exactly as he drafted them,” including one of Justice Stewart’s most celebrated opinions. Indeed, all of the Justices relied heavily on their law clerks, particularly for working out details; as Bernard Schwartz explained in his discussion of the Burger Court’s processes, “The Justices normally outline the way they want opinions drafted. But the drafting clerk is left with a great deal of discretion on the details of the opinion, particularly the specific reasoning and research supporting the decision. Id. at 2112; see also John B. Oakley, William W. Schwarzer: A Judge for All Seasons, 28 U.C. DAVIS L. REV. 1097, 1098 (1995) (describing how much federal judges rely on the help of their law clerks).

See Martha S. West, The Historical Roots of Affirmative Action, 10 LA RAZA L.J. 607, 614 (1998) (describing the stereotype of black incompetence and recounting a story that demonstrates how “[i]f you have dark skin in this society . . . you may . . . discounted in meetings, or assumed to be less competent than a white person when you walk into a room for a job interview or to give a lecture”). In fact, Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid recently expressed his strong opposition to the idea of Justice Thomas being appointed Chief Justice, claiming that the Justice is an “embarrassment,” that his “opinions are poorly written,” and that he has not “done a good job as a Supreme Court Justice.” Zev Chafets, Slap at Thomas Stinks of Racism, N.Y. DAILY NEWS, Dec. 8, 2004, at 43. At the same time, however, Senator Reid has asserted that Justice Scalia is suitable for the position because he “is one smart guy.” Michael A. Fletcher, Reid Says He Could Back Scalia for Chief Justice: Comments anger Liberals and Thomas Supporters, WASH. POST, Dec. 7, 2004, at A04. The seemingly obvious explanation of the senator’s strikingly different opinions of two justices with similar conservative views is the stereotype of black incompetence. See Chafets, supra note, at 43.

In this Article, I make no claim that Justice Thomas’s political views are immune from attack. I challenge only those criticisms contending that Justice Thomas is Justice Scalia’s puppet and has no independent voice.
jurisprudence, while conservative, is, in certain important respects, distinct from that of his white, conservative counterparts and is intrinsically linked to his identity as a southern black man in the United States. Part I of this Article examines and describes the development of black conservative ideology in the United States and how such ideology is distinct from white conservative rhetoric and theory. Part II of this Article provides an overview of Justice Thomas’s background, highlighting pivotal experiences during his childhood, education, and career that have shaped his racial identity and his views about how racial equality should be achieved within and through the law. Part III of this Article examines and explains the development of Justice Thomas’s jurisprudence as participating in America’s long history of black conservative thought (described in Part I) as seen in Supreme Court cases concerning education and desegregation, affirmative action, and crime. Finally, this Article concludes by exploring what the most commonly heard criticisms of Justice Thomas teach us about race and the impact of racial identity.

I. THE DEVELOPMENT OF BLACK CONSERVATIVE IDEOLOGY

[T]here was an appearance within the conservative ranks that blacks were to be tolerated but not necessarily welcomed. There appeared to be a presumption, albeit refutable, that blacks could not be conservative... Hence, in challenging either positions or emphases on policy matters, one had to be careful not to go so far as to lose one’s conservative credentials... Certainly, pluralism on these issues were not encouraged or invited—especially from blacks... Dissent bore a price—one I gladly paid.

—Clarence Thomas

28 Cf. Calmore, supra note 21, at 176 (noting that “our judiciary ... is [not] an impartial institution that stands independently against the tide of racial politics and ideology”); see also Johnson, supra note 11, at 7–14 (describing the potential beneficial impact of the appointment of a Latino/a to the Supreme Court).

29 See Calmore, supra note 21, at 192 (“[Justice Thomas’s] jurisprudence ... is deeply personal and his black identity and biography stand closely behind his Supreme Court votes and opinions.”).

30 Clarence Thomas, No Room at the Inn: The Loneliness of the Black Conservative, in BLACK AND RIGHT: THE BOLD NEW VOICE OF BLACK CONSERVATIVES IN AMERICA 8 (1997); see also JANE MAYER & JILL ABRAMSON, STRANGE JUSTICE: THE SELLING OF CLARENCE THOMAS 52 (1994) (quoting Thomas as saying “I don’t fit in with whites and I don’t fit in with blacks’”); Robert C. Smith & Hanes Walton, Jr., U–Turn:
A. The History of Black Conservatism

Although black conservatives have only recently begun to gain widespread attention—especially since the appointment of Justice Thomas in 1991—Justice Thomas is only one of a long line of black individuals to espouse conservative ideas. Indeed, the development of black conservative thought has deep historical roots, reaching all the way back to Martin Kilson and Black Conservatives, 62 TRANSITION 209–10 (1993) (highlighting how “many black traditional Republicans . . . worked hard to have [the Republican Party] deal with the plight of African Americans” and were excluded from conservative administrations); see also Madhavi Sunder, Cultural Dissent, 54 STAN. L. REV. 495, 566 (2001) (arguing that it is important for law to address the exclusion of individuals who seek both to retain cultural membership and to pursue freedom from discrimination and repression within their cultural communities).

See Randall Kennedy, Justice Thomas and Racial Loyalty, AM. LAW, Sept. 1998, at 91 (asserting that “Thomas’s thinking . . . [has] deep roots in Afro-American history and culture as reflected in the idea of such figures as Booker T. Washington, Kelly Miller, George Schuyler, Zora Neale Hurston, and Thomas Sowell”). As a general matter, conservatives can be divided into three different groups: (1) the anti-statist faction; (2) organic faction; and (3) the neoconservative faction. The anti-statist faction of conservatism focuses on decreasing the role of the state in American politics. As a general matter, this group of conservatives places a strong emphasis on the role of the individual in society and, in turn, demands a strict limit on government control and authority. The organic faction of conservatism concentrates more on issues of morality and culture and is strongly influenced by religion. Today, this group of conservatives is largely controlled by the “Religious Right.” The third faction of conservatism is the neoconservative group, into which many black conservatives fit. The neoconservatives, many of whom were once liberals, oppose the expansion of government and social welfare programs (much like their counterparts). KENNETH M. DOLBEARE & LINDA J. METCALF, AMERICAN IDEOLOGIES TODAY 151–152 (1993); Lewis A. Randolph, A Historical Analysis and Critique of Contemporary Black Conservatism, W. J. OF BLACK STUDIES, 150–51 (1995).

This Article focuses on the anti-statist and neoconservative factions of conservatives and does not address the organic faction.

Additionally, there are various strands of black conservative thought. Peter Eisenstadt, Introduction, to BLACK CONSERVATISM: ESSAYS IN INTELLECTUAL AND POLITICAL HISTORY xv (Peter Eisenstadt ed., 1999). By discussing black conservative ideology as a whole, I do not mean to suggest that all black conservatives “think alike.” In fact, black conservatism is so rich and varied that it is difficult to define one particular ideology as black conservative thought. As one author stated about black conservatism, “[a]ny generalization about black conservatism is subject to the following two limitations: (1) It will not be true of all black conservatives, [and] (2) it will be true of...
to the late 1700s and developing from a past ideology centered around a gradualist approach to achieving equality that required a practical and strategic accommodation of Whites to today’s black empowerment and self-reliance themes.

Although traces of black conservative thought can be found as far back as the 1700s, the most prominent historical figure among black conservatives is Booker T. Washington, who emerged as a leader of the many individuals who are not black conservatives.” Id. at x.

Common themes and ideas, however, have persisted throughout the history of black conservatism and pervade nearly every faction of black conservatism. For the sake of simplicity, I have drawn together ideas from black conservatives (in particular, black neoconservatives) whose views on the issues of education/desegregation, affirmative action, and crime coincide with those expressed by Justice Thomas and refer to this collection of ideas as “black conservative thought” or “black conservative ideology.” I am not, however, making any claims that all conservatives or all black conservatives (or all liberals or all black liberals) adhere to the principles described herein. For the purposes of this Article, however, I have made generalizations about both conservatives and liberals, ethnic and non-ethnic.

For example, Jupiter Hammon, a Long Island slave, is considered to be one of the first Blacks to express black conservative ideas, in particular those that related to Blacks’ proving their worthiness to Whites as a strategic move to gaining more rights. According to Hammon, “[f]ree blacks had a special responsibility to uphold moral standards, to avoid stealing and laziness, to prove themselves worthy of freedom, and to dispel canards about black incapacity for self-directed lives.” Eisenstadt, supra note 32, at xv.

To many Blacks and many Whites, today’s black conservative is viewed as an accommodationist, a person who is willing to “sell out his or her race” to gain acceptance from Whites. See Steele, CONTENT OF OUR CHARACTER, supra note 24, at 164. As Steele explains, “[T]his is the most constant charge against the black conservative—that he does not love his own people—an unpardonable sin that justifies his symbolic annihilation. . . . [A]n Uncle Tom . . . whose failure to love his people makes him an accessory to their oppression. . . . Thus black conservatives do not yet comprise a loyal opposition; they are, instead, classic dissenters. . . . [living] a life openly subversive to [their] own group and often impractical for [themselves] . . . .” Steele, A DREAM DEFERRED, supra note 24, at 7–8; see also Sunder, supra note 30, at 566 (“[Individuals are increasingly refusing to take their cultures lying down. Rejecting old notions of imposed identity, more and more, individuals want reason, choice, and autonomy within their cultural communities. They want cultural on their own terms.”).

Booker T. Washington was born a slave in Hale’s Ford, Virginia in 1858 or 1859. See Booker T. Washington, UP FROM SLAVERY 1 (1900). After emancipation, Washington’s family was so poor that he was forced to work in salt furnaces and coal mines at the tender age of 9. See Booker T. Washington, THE STORY OF MY LIFE AND WORK 48 (1900) [hereinafter “WASHINGTON, STORY”]; Donald B. Gibson, Strategies and black community during the post-Reconstruction era. Specifically, Washington’s rise to prominence occurred in the late 1800s and early 1900s, a period that was replete with violence against Blacks, including lynching, and consistent violations of the rights of Blacks as freed persons.

As a response to the repeated attacks against black people during this period, Washington and certain other black men strategically formed coalitions with white conservative elites as a means of ensuring the safety of Blacks in the South. The ideology of Washington and these men was as follows: “if [Blacks] play by [Whites’] rules, and prove [their] worthiness according to [those] standards, [Whites] will have no choice but to accommodate [Blacks].” In other words, acknowledging the strong and often violent resistance by Whites to efforts by Blacks to have their rights recognized, Washington and his followers developed a strategic, gradual approach to achieving racial equality that did not threaten to overturn the status quo too quickly.

To Washington and his followers, Blacks had a duty to focus on their own economic and moral advancement through self-help, rather than seek progress through legal and political changes that required the approval and cooperation of Whites because Whites would never accept Blacks until Blacks proved themselves worthy of such acceptance or, more so, because Whites may never accept Blacks at all.\textsuperscript{41}

Indeed, for Washington and other “representative men of the race,”\textsuperscript{42} this philosophy of accommodation, coupled with self-help, proved extremely successful in certain, selected instances. Many southern Whites, who were extremely resistant to any radical change in the status of Blacks, found Washington’s views more palatable than those of other \textsuperscript{41} See August Meier, Negro Class Structure and Ideology in the Age of Booker T. Washington, 23 PHYLON 258, 258 (1962) (describing Washington’s philosophy as being that “[o]nce Negroes had proven their ability to help themselves, to acquire wealth and respectability, it was believed, prejudice and discrimination would wither away”). Some have argued that Washington was not an accommodationist, but a realist who used trickery to help further progress among black people. See generally Gibson, supra note 35 (describing Washington’s autobiography UP FROM SLAVERY (1900) as deliberately addressing white desire regarding racial matters and “assuag[ing] guilt in assuring its white audience that blacks, in slavery and out, were utterly and entirely without ‘bitterness’”).

\textsuperscript{42} Randolph, supra note 31, at 152. These men tended to be members of the black upper-class, some of whom “felt that their education and cultural upbringing, and not race, would secure for them first class citizenship rights” and some of whom felt that an accommodationist approach to resolving severe prejudices against Blacks “was far better than no approach” at all. Randolph, supra note 31, at 152–53; see also GEORGE S. SCHUYLER, BLACK AND CONSERVATIVE 4 (1966) (“My folks boasted of having been free as far back as any them could or wanted to remember, and they haughtily looked down upon those who had been in servitude. They neither cherished nor sang slave songs.”). Cf. WILLARD B. GATEWOOD, ARISTOCRATS OF COLOR 302 (1993); see Meier, supra note 41, at 260 (stating that it was among the “upward middle class [of Blacks during the 1920s] that the philosophy of racial progress through economic solidarity . . . and the philosophy of Booker T. Washington found their greatest support”). Although many of Washington’s followers were from the black upper class, Washington’s philosophies, as opposed to W.E.B. DuBois’s, are often viewed as designed to help the average black man, and not just the Talented Tenth, as the most privileged Blacks were referred to by Dubois, who believed that it would be this tenth that would help to raise the race.
black leaders such as W.E.B. DuBois, and some even provided Washington with the social and financial support to institute the programs he saw as being most beneficial to Blacks. For example, with the assistance of white philanthropists, in 1881, Washington founded the Tuskegee Normal and Industrial Institute, which was created to train Blacks to work in agriculture fields and, in part, as teachers.

Washington’s beliefs were viewed as too conciliatory by many Blacks, including W.E.B. DuBois, who lambasted Washington for not forcing the white South to correct its wrongs through “candid and honest criticism.” By 1911 and 1912, Washington’s power in the black community had waned, and black resistance to his “conservative” ideas had grown stronger.

---

43 See Franklin, supra note 37 (asserting that Whites were more comfortable with Washington’s approach because of its gradual nature); W.E.B. DuBois, THE SOULS OF BLACK FOLK 16 (1903), reprinted by Vintage Books in 1986 (“It startled the Nation to hear a Negro advocating such a programme after many decades of bitter complaint; it startled and won the applause of the South. . . .”)

44 See WASHINGTON, STORY, supra note 35, at 79-82. This institution is now known as Tuskegee University.

45 W.E.B. DuBois, a native of Massachusetts, received his many degrees from Fisk University in Nashville, Tennessee, the University of Berlin in Germany, and Harvard University. He was the first Black ever to receive his Ph.D in history from Harvard. See Richard Delgado, Book Review, Explaining the Rise and Fall of African-American Fortunes—Interest Convergence and Civil Rights Gains, 37 HARV. C.R.-C.L. L. REV. 369, 379 (2002). DuBois, one of the founders of the NAACP, is famous for his prophetic statement, “The problem of the twentieth century is the problem of the color-line,” which continues to prove true in the twenty-first century. DuBois, supra note 43, at 16; Richard Delgado, supra note at 379 (quoting DuBois and noting that DuBois founded the NAACP in 1909); David B. Wilkins, Two Paths to the Mountaintop? The Role of Legal Education in Shaping Values of Black Corporate Lawyers, 45 STAN. L. REV. 1981, 1999 (1993) (describing how even today society cannot escape the reality of the problem of the color line); see also GLEN LOURY, ONE BY ONE FROM THE INSIDE OUT 35 (1995) (describing the parallels between the debates of followers of Washington and DuBois to that of Justices Thomas and Marshall).

46 See DUBoIS, supra note 43, at 47.

47 See Bruce, supra note 40, at 245. Some Blacks had criticized Washington prior to this time. For example, in 1904, Jesse Max Barber, a former editor of the Voice of the Negro, satirized Washington when he wrote an article entitled “What Is A Good Negro?” In response to this question, Barber wrote, “‘A good Negro’ is one who says that his race does not need the higher learning; that what they need is industrial education, pure and simple. He stands up before his people and murders the truth and the Kings English in trying to enforce upon them the evils of a College Education and the beauties of the Despite this resistance, black conservatism endured past the post-Reconstruction period and into the very beginnings of the Civil Rights Movement. The most dominant black conservative in between these two important time periods (during the 1920s, 1930s, and 1940s) was George Schuyler, a journalist who asserted that the “American Negro . . . has been the outstanding example of American conservatism: adjustable, resourceful, adaptable, patient, restrained, and not given to gambling what advantages he has in quixotic adventures.” As Schuyler described in his book Black and Conservative, conservatism continued to thrive among many of the black elite, who “regarded [black Southern migrants] as illiterate, ill-bred, and amoral” and unlike the “old Northern Negro families [who] had the habits, traits, and outlook of the whites for whom they worked and whose prejudices they shared.”

By the 1950s, however, black conservatism began to change. As opposed to focusing on maintaining a gradual approach to seeking equality that was designed not to increase white resistance to black equality, blacks conservatives, like Schuyler, began to focus solely on principles of self-help and self-reliance by Blacks, not necessarily because they would least irritate or upset Whites, but instead because they believed that Whites would not act in the best interests of Blacks. As Schuyler explained in his autobiography:

> Once we accept the fact that there is, and will always be a color caste system in the United States, and stop crying about it, we can concentrate on how best to survive and plow.”

See Ann Rayson, George Schuyler: Paradox Among “Assimilationist” Writers, 12 BLACK AMER. LIT. F. 102, 104 (1978) (“In his autobiography, Schuyler expresses the attitude of Booker T. Washington: ‘My feeling was then, and it is stronger now . . . that Negroes have the best chance here in the United States if they will avail themselves of the numerous opportunities they have.”). George Schuyler was born on February 25, 1895 and was raised in Syracuse, New York. Schuyler’s family was considered middle class within the class system among Blacks. According to Schuyler, his “folks [were] free black citizens of New York State” since the early 1800s. Oscar R. Williams, From Black Liberal to Black Conservative: George Schuyler, 1923–1935, 21 AFRO-AMERS. IN N.Y. LIFE & HISTORY 59 (1997).

Id. at 4.
prosper within that system. This is not defeatism but realism.\textsuperscript{51}

In the 1960s, the voice of black conservatives, as we traditionally conceive of them, became weaker in light of the strength and pervasiveness of the Black Power Movement.\textsuperscript{52} A few of these traditional black conservatives, like Schuyler, however, continued to express their views and denounced liberal black leaders for their “civil rights agitation,” which, to their minds, simply created more enemies of the race and resulted in no true gains for the people.\textsuperscript{53} Additionally, Schuyler rejected the philosophies of black nationalists,\textsuperscript{54} such as Malcolm X, who “opposed an integrationist understanding of racial progress”\textsuperscript{55} and whom today’s black conservatives proudly claim as one of their own.\textsuperscript{56}

\textsuperscript{51} Id. at 122.
\textsuperscript{52} Lewis A. Randolph, \textit{Black Neoconservatives in the United States, in Race & Politics} 150–51 (James Jennings ed. 1997) [hereinafter Randolph, \textit{Black Neoconservatives}].
\textsuperscript{53} SCHUYLER, supra note 42, at 342; see also Williams, supra note 48, at 59 (noting that “Schuyler openly professed his beliefs during a time when conservative ideology among African Americans did not have a widespread audience in mainstream America” and “was a pioneer of 20th century black conservative ideology”). \textit{Cf.} Mark Gavreau Judge, \textit{Justice To George Schuyler}, Pol. Rev., Aug. 2000, at 41 (“Schuyler’s dogmatic conservatism ran in absolute contrast to philosophies expressed by virtually every major spokesperson of the civil rights movement.”). Schuyler even went as far as to defend police tactics that were utilized in response to marches and sit-ins, noting that the “use of firehoses, tear gas, and dogs was cited with horror, as if these were not true and tried methods of mob control the world over.” SCHUYLER, supra note 42, at 346. He also stated that he had “observed the police handling of the most recent Harlem riot and [thought] the police restraint was admirable in the face of harsh provocation.” \textit{Id.} at 346-47. Schuyler believed that the Civil Rights Movement was communist-inspired and that Communists were merely using Blacks to further their agenda. \textit{See} Williams, supra note 48, at 59. Schuyler also opposed the selection of Martin Luther King, Jr. for the Nobel Peace Prize. \textit{See} Rayson, supra note 48, at 102 (also noting that Schuyler’s “conservative views were so insistent that in 1964 he supported Barry Goldwater for President despite what most blacks regarded as a racist Republican Party platform”).
\textsuperscript{55} Peller, supra note 36, at 761.
\textsuperscript{56} Juan Williams, \textit{A Question of Fairness}, ATLANTIC MONTHLY, Feb. 1987, at 73 [hereinafter “Williams, Fairness”]. Many black conservatives have adopted Malcolm X as a conservative today because of his philosophies were rooted in the principles of black
Despite Schuyler’s rejection of black nationalism, some black nationalists, including those belonging to the Nation of Islam, actually constituted a strong voice for black conservatism.\footnote{\textcopyright{} id. (quoting Clarence Thomas as saying “I don’t see how the civil-rights people today can claim Malcolm X as one of their own. Where does he say black people should go begging to the Labor Department for jobs? He was hell on integrationists. Where does he say you should sacrifice your institutions to be next to white people?”).} Like Washington and Schuyler, the Nation of Islam promoted the ideals of self-reliance and self-determination and founded small black businesses and schools as a means toward developing a separate society for Blacks.\footnote{See Hayward Farrar, \textit{Radical Rhetoric, Conservative Reality: The Nation of Islam as an American Conservative Formation, in BLACK CONSERVATISM: ESSAYS IN INTELLECTUAL AND POLITICAL HISTORY} 109-29 (Peter Eisenstadt ed., 1999) (arguing that, although the Nation of Islam is largely perceived as radical, it “has actually been a conservative force in the black community”). Farrar also argues that Marcus Garvey, who led the Back–To–Africa Movement, and his organization, the Universal Negro Improvement Association, was a precursor to the Nation. \textit{See id.} at 110 (asserting that Garvey preached that, by creating black-controlled social, economic, and political structures, Blacks could achieve free themselves from white domination). Like the Nation, Garvey was also heavily criticized by Schuyler. \textit{See SCHUYLER, supra note 42, at 122-24.}} Indeed, it is no surprise that Malcolm X, an adopted black conservative today, was once a member of the Nation of Islam.\footnote{See Farrar, \textit{supra} note 57, at 113-14, 127 (citing the Million March as an example of the Nation’s conservatism with its focus on self-help). Of course, these are principles also adopted by black liberals, only liberals also recognize how institutionalized barriers make strict self-reliance difficult. \textit{See Richard Delgado, Book Review, Enormous Anomaly? Left-Right Parallels in Recent Writing About Race, 91 COLUM. L. REV. 1547, 1552-53 (1991) (noting that both black leftists and conservatives rely on principles of individual agency and volition but that black conservatives emphasize such principles more and that black liberals focus more on issues concerning social power and relations). \textit{See Farrar, supra note 57, at 115-16.}}} In fact, to black conservatives during this time period, such as Robert Woodson, who later worked at the National Urban League; the now accepted Malcolm X, a black nationalist; and the Nation of Islam, the welfare of Blacks rested in the hands of Blacks.\footnote{\textit{SCHUYLER, supra note 42, at 344. George Schuyler continued to express black conservatism until he passed away in 1977. \textit{See Williams, supra note 48, at 59; see also .}} As Malcolm X once expressed during a speech, a favorite of Justice Thomas’s:

\begin{quote}
The American black man should be focusing his every self-reliance. Cf. \textit{id.} (quoting Clarence Thomas as saying “I don’t see how the civil-rights people today can claim Malcolm X as one of their own. Where does he say black people should go begging to the Labor Department for jobs? He was hell on integrationists. Where does he say you should sacrifice your institutions to be next to white people?”).\end{quote} effort toward building his own businesses and decent homes for himself. As other ethnic groups have done, let the black people, wherever possible, however possible, patronize their own kind, and start in those ways to build up the black race’s ability to do for itself. That’s the only way the American black man is ever going to get respect.61

In sum, to this new black conservative, it was Blacks alone, even in the face of enormous discrimination and without the assistance of Whites, who would control their own destiny.62 The issue for these conservatives was black empowerment and black-self reliance.63

B. Today’s Black Conservatives

Like their predecessors, today’s black conservatives, such as Justice Thomas, John McWhorter,64 Shelby Steele,65 Thomas Sowell,66

61 Quoted in Williams, A Question of Fairness, supra note 56, at 73.
62 See SCHUYLER, supra note 42, at 352 (“There are forces in the world that want us to fail and conspire toward that failure, which means disunity and destruction. We are here blessed with the right of mobility, the right of ownership, the privilege of privacy and development of personality, and the precious machinery of peaceful change. These gifts and gains it is the purpose of the conservative to defend and extend, lest we perish in the fell clutch of collectivism. These gifts and gains I have been trying in my small way to preserve.”).
64 John McWhorter, an associate professor of linguistics at the University of California-Berkeley, is a Manhattan Institute Senior Fellow in Public Policy. He first gained national prominence four years ago with the publication of LOSING THE RACE: SELF–SABOTAGE IN BLACK AMERICA (200)), in which he argued that black people’s attachment to victimhood was a much greater hindrance to black advancement than white racism. See John McWhorter, available at http://www.manhattan-institute.org/html/mcwhorter.htm.
65 Shelby Steele, a graduate of Coe College in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, Southern Illinois University, and the University of Utah, is a research fellow at the Hoover Institution. At the Institute, Steele specializes in the study of race relations, multiculturalism, and affirmative action. In 1990, he received the National Book Critic’s Circle Award for his book THE CONTENT OF OUR CHARACTER: A NEW VISION OF RACE IN AMERICA. See Shelby Steele, Research Fellow, available at http://www-hoover.stanford.edu/bios/steele.html.
66 Thomas Sowell, a graduate of Harvard University, Columbia University, and the and J.C. Watts, emphasize the principles of black empowerment through self-reliance and self-help. Unlike their predecessors, however, today’s black conservatives hold an even more prominent presence in the media and among non-minority, American voters. During the 1980s, although Blacks remained overwhelmingly loyal to the “liberal” Democratic Party and to progressive ideologies, the voice of the black conservative grew.

University of Chicago, is a senior fellow at the Hoover Institute in Stanford, California. Prior to joining the Hoover Institute, Sowell was a professor at several institutions, including Brandeis University and Cornell University. See Thomas Sowell, Rose and Milton Friedman Senior Fellow on Public Policy, available at http://www-hoover.stanford.edu/bios/sowell.html.

67 A former quarterback for the Oklahoma Sooners, Big Eight Champions in 1980 and 1981, J.C. Watts was elected to the United States Congress from the fourth district of Oklahoma in 1994. In 1998, he became the first Black to serve in the House Republican leadership when he was elected by his peers to serve as chairman of the Republican Conference, which was the fourth-ranking leadership position in the majority party in the United States House of Representatives, and a position once held by Dick Cheney, Jack Kemp, and Gerald Ford. See The Honorable J.C. Watts, Jr., available at http://www.gopac.com/gopac_about_bios.htm; see generally J.C. WATTS, JR., WHAT COLOR IS A CONSERVATIVE? (2002).

68 See, e.g., STEELE, CONTENT OF OUR CHARACTER, supra note 24, at 161 (“But, while civil rights bills can be won [collectively], only the individual can achieve in school, master a salable skill, open a business, become an accountant or engineer. Despite our collective oppression, opportunities for development can finally be exploited only by individuals.”). Again, slack liberals also emphasize these principles as well; however, also recognizing that racism is also institutionalized, they contend that such institutional factors may also prevented persons who have worked hard and persevered through hard times. See Delgado, supra note 58, at 1548-49 (describing how critiques of black liberals and conservatives converge on civil rights issues by “all finding serious fault with (a) the racial status quo; and (b) the current system of civil rights laws and policies by which that status quo is maintained and (sometimes) permitted to evolve”).

69 Willie Richardson & Gwen Richardson, Black Conservatives: The Undercounted, in BLACK AND RIGHT: THE BOLD NEW VOICE OF BLACK CONSERVATIVES IN AMERICA 44–45 (1997) (asserting that a larger portion of Blacks no longer align themselves with liberal politicians and policies and the black conservative voice is becoming more prominent).

70 See Edward Ashbee, The Republican Party and the African-American Vote Since 1964, in BLACK CONSERVATISM 233 (1999) (noting that the “black electorate has proved the Democratic Party’s most loyal constituency”). Although many Blacks hold conservative positions on issues such as abortion, Blacks have generally voted with the “liberal” political party, which today is the Democratic Party. See, e.g., Kennedy, supra note 31, at 91 (acknowledging that many Blacks are socially conservative on issues of abortion and crime).
Due to a variety of factors, including matters such as the emergence of the black middle and upper middle class, more Blacks began to identify with conservative values and openly join the Republican Party. Still, many individuals in the black community remained and continue to remain skeptical about the politics of black conservatives. In contrast to liberal ideology, which is centered on the belief that government should play an active role in addressing the imbalances in power, wealth, and privilege among Whites and minorities, anti-statist conservative ideology involves a strong resistance to governmental interference in domestic policy affairs, interference which, to the minds of many Blacks, is what facilitated minority advancement in society. Thus, as one author has noted, “a black critic speaking with the backing of the political and intellectual right bears a difficult burden of showing that he is not a tool of forces hostile to his own people.”

This task is daunting, given widely held perceptions among black liberals and other liberals that black conservatives are mere pawns of the Republican Party. A careful review of literature authored by many of today’s black conservatives, however, lays some foundation for addressing this challenge. In particular, books and articles from self-identified black conservatives, such as McWhorter and Steele, expose several significant differences between the most dominant themes of “black conservative ideology” and “white conservative ideology,” which in turn helps to disprove the idea that black conservatives are the “tools”

---

71 See Randolph, Black Neoconservatives, supra note 52, at 152–53. Some authors have asserted that more than 30% of Blacks identify themselves as “conservative.” See, e.g., Earl Ofari Hutchinson, The Crisis in Black and Black 10 (1997); see also Richardson & Richardson, supra note 69, at 43.
72 See Bridgeman, supra note 12 (manuscript at 8, on file with the author) (asserting that “authentic blackness’ has an anti-conservative political bent”).
73 See Joan Biskupic, Thomas Caught Up in Conflict; Jurist’s Court Rulings, Life Experience Are at Odds, Many Blacks Say, WASH. POST, June 7, 1996, at A20 (noting that Professor Stephen Carter of Yale Law School has described the Supreme Court as “the ultimate place that black people had been able to go to to vindicate their rights”)
74 Hill, supra note 63, at 28 (quotations omitted); see also Peter Beinart, Wedded, NEW REPUB., Apr. 5, 2004, at 8 (noting “black suspicion of the Republican Party”); Smith & Walton, Jr., supra note 30, at 215 (arguing that black conservatives are clients of the Republican Party).
75 See Kennedy, supra note 12 (manuscript at 28, on file with author) (describing how Justice Thomas has been viewed as a pawn because of his substantive positions on issues of race).
of their white counterparts.

1. Core Principles of Black Conservative Thought

   Although both black and white conservatives share many basic philosophies of conservatism, such as the belief in less involvement by the federal government in economic and social welfare matters, a greater emphasis on individual responsibility, and more authority and control within local and state governments, they diverge in important respects on the basis and reasoning for their positions on particular issues, such as affirmative action. The core principles of black conservative thought consist of two key concepts: (1) an emphasis on the departure from black “victimology”; (2) the promotion of self-reliance and the elimination of dependency by Blacks on Whites or the government, which is believed to go to the heart of what black conservatives view as the problems underlying unemployment, crime, and poverty in the black community.

   To many black conservatives, such as Shelby Steele, the low status of Blacks in the United States is the result of a system of black victimization, which is treated not as a problem to be solved but as an identity to be nurtured.

---

76 DOLBEARE & METCALF, supra note 31, at 151–61; see also STEELE, A DREAM DEFERRED, supra note 24, at 8 (“The liberal–conservative axis is a bit different for blacks than for Americans generally. Under his American identity a black Republican is conservative, but under his racial identity he may be quite liberal . . . . But the ‘new’ black conservatives—the ones who recently become so controversial—may even be liberal by their American identity but are definitely conservative by the terms of their group identity. It is their dissent from the explanation of black group authority that brings them the ‘black conservative’ imprimatur. Without this dissent, we may have a black Republican but not a ‘black conservative,’ as the term has come to be used.”).

77 See McWhorter, supra note 64, at xi (defining the cult of victimology as “a keystone of cultural blackness to treat victimhood not as a problem to be solved but as an identity to be nurtured”); STEELE, A DREAM DEFERRED, supra note 24, at 10 (“[A] black conservative is a black who dissents from the victimization explanation of black fate when it is offered as a totalism—when it is made the main theme of group politics.”); WATTS, supra note 67, at 35 (asserting that Jesse Jackson’s phrase “‘I am somebody’ has become ‘I am somebody’s victim’” and that Watts rejects this “fashionable ‘cult of victimology’”); see also STEELE, CONTENT OF OUR CHARACTER, supra note 24, at ix (noting that Blacks have been taught to be “seen primarily as racial victims”).

78 See Hill, supra note 63, at 29 (quoting Clarence Thomas as saying “the key to black progress must come from within the black community”). But see Randolph, Black Neoconservatives, supra note 52, at 154 (arguing that the “Black neoconservative call for self-reliance is inconsistent with their extensive dependency on funding from White conservative sources”).
dependency on the white establishment and a lack of self-reliance and empowerment. According to today’s black conservatives, these two factors, combined with black victimology (meaning the perception of Blacks as victims only), keep Blacks in a subordinate position because it leaves Blacks in “the odd and self-defeating position in which taking responsibility for bettering [themselves] feels like a surrender to white power.”

Additionally, contrary to popular belief, black conservatives do not deny the existence of racism and its effects on Blacks, but instead refuse to focus their energies on past and current injustices to the race. To their minds, they are not accommodationists or sell-outs, but realists. For example, as George Schuyler explained in his biography,

A black person learns very early that his color is a disadvantage in a world of white folk. . . . . I learned very early in life that I was colored but from the beginning this fact did not distress, restrain, or overburden me. One takes things as they are, lives with them, and tries to turn them to one’s advantage or seeks another locale where the opportunities are more favorable. This was the conservative viewpoint of my parents and family. It has been mine through life.

In support of this view that realism, self-help, and self-reliance are the best means for resolving issues of poverty, substandard education, lack of power, and devastating crime in the black community, black conservatives often point to the long history of Blacks who overcame obstacles to achieve their goals, even during the post-Reconstruction and Jim Crow eras.

---

79 See Steele, Content of Our Character, supra note 24, at 15 (arguing that racial victimization cannot be the real problem if “[r]esidents feel less safe, drug trafficking is far worse, crimes by blacks against blacks are more frequent, housing remains substandard, and teenage pregnancy has skyrocketed” since the 1960s).

80 Schuyler, supra note 42, at 2 (emphasis added).

82 Eisenstadt, supra note 32, at xi. See, e.g., John McWhorter, Authentically Black 141 (2003) (describing several black public schools that regularly produced
The final theme throughout black conservative thought is the belief that “the most effective [and] lasting changes” in society occur slowly, or its corollary, the belief that “quick fixes,” which black conservatives contend are too often supported by black and white liberals, serve as a temporary band-aid to the real and serious problems ailing Blacks. Indeed, what is most interesting about black conservative thought is that its central tenets are premised on a belief that white America has created an addiction for Blacks to victimology and dependency without any real concern for addressing the problems underlying black oppression. In other words, a key component to black conservative ideology is a certain “distrust” of Whites—even the conservative Whites with whom black conservatives work.

Furthermore, this “distrust” is only fueled by the isolation and exclusion that black conservatives can and do encounter in white conservative circles. As a general matter, many black conservatives acknowledge that the larger conservative community does not have the best interests of the black community in mind. As Thomas explained himself in an article he wrote regarding the loneliness of a black conservative:

---

Ph.D’s and other prominent figures between the late 1800s and 1950s); Telly Lovelace, No Need For A Government Handout, in BLACK AND RIGHT: THE BOLD NEW VOICE OF BLACK CONSERVATIVES IN AMERICA 47 (1997) (noting the successes of Blacks during the antebellum period and thereafter); Thomas Sowell, Black Excellence: The Case of Dunbar High School, 35 PUB. INTEREST 3, 4 (Spring 1974).

83 Eisenstadt, supra note 32, at 83; see also Calmore, supra note 21, at 193 (describing the principal tenets of black conservatism as including “touting a rugged American individualism, translating it into black personal responsibility and self help; viewing race as abstracted and disconnected from group identity; limiting rights holders to individuals rather than groups; endorsing race neutral laws and public policies; dissenting from ‘civil rights professionals;’ preaching ‘compassionate conservatism’ or ‘tough love;’ favoring market-oriented reform (free markets and entrepreneurship) with little state regulation; discounting the operational significance of race and the importance of racism as one of black America’s most fundamental problems; emphasizing the need to reverse black moral decline, crime, poverty, and family dysfunction (welfare dependency); and opposing abortion”).

84 Angela Katrina Lewis, African-American Conservatism: A Longitudinal and Comparative Study 4 (2000) (unpublished Ph.D. dissertation, University of Tennessee) (on file with the University of Tennessee Library) (noting that black conservatives believe that government programs have caused the “deterioration of Black families” and have created “a sense of dependency among African-Americans”).
It often seemed that to be accepted within conservative ranks and to be treated with some degree of acceptance, a black was required to become a caricature of sorts, providing sideshows of anti-black quips and attacks. But there was more—much more—to our concerns than merely attacking previous policies and so-called black leaders. The future, not the past, was to be influenced. It is not surprising, with these attitudes, that there was a general refusal to listen to the opinions of black conservatives. In fact, it often appeared that our white counterparts actually hid from our advice. There was a general sense that we were being avoided and circumvented. It seemed that those of us who had been identified as black conservatives were in a rather odd position.\textsuperscript{85}

Additionally, Justice Thomas proclaimed the following about the “well-meaning” of white liberals, stating:

“[I]t doesn’t matter that black and white Americans are unlikely to ever see each other as anything other but blacks and whites. It doesn’t matter that a black man in America is only rarely judged on the basis of character rather than his color. . . . For when you get right down to it . . . successful blacks don’t particularly like the kind of integration that whites have crafted for them in the past thirty years. Increasing numbers of middle-class blacks see integration simple as window dressing; blacks may be present and visible, but only a few have any real power.”\textsuperscript{86}

\textsuperscript{85} Thomas, \textit{supra} note 30, at 9 (emphasis added). In fact, Thomas has expressed frustration with certain decisions made during his tenure in the Reagan administration. For example, in describing the administration’s decision to support a tax exemption for Bob Jones University in 1982, Thomas explained, “I expressed grave concerns in a previously scheduled meeting that this would be the undoing of those of us in the administration who had hoped for an opportunity to expand the thinking of, and about, black Americans. A fellow member of the administration said rather glibly that, in two days, the furor over \textit{Bob Jones} would end. I responded that we had sounded our death knell with that decision. Unfortunately, I was more right than he was.” \textit{Id.}

\textsuperscript{86} Quoted in Williams, \textit{A Question of Fairness, supra} note 56, at 72; see also Stuart DeVeaux, \textit{Young, Black, and Republican, in BLACK AND RIGHT: THE BOLD NEW VOICE}
In essence, unlike their white conservative counterparts, many black conservatives do not believe that a colorblind society is, practically speaking, attainable. Rather, they believe that Blacks must learn to do for and rely on themselves alone, not only because they are black but also because Blacks cannot and should not expect Whites to act in their best interests.

In fact, all of the previously described concepts are reflected in black conservative stances on certain political and social issues. The remainder of this Part details how the core principles of abandoning black victimology, encouraging self-reliance and self-help, and focusing on lasting and permanent change reveal themselves in black conservative thought on issues of education and desegregation, affirmative action, and crime, subjects I address later in my analysis of Justice Thomas’s jurisprudence.

2. Education and Desegregation

One of the focal points of black conservative thought on education is the failure of the public school system to educate black youth in a manner that allows them to compete, based on traditional criteria, with their white peers. All around the country, black conservatives have expressed intense criticisms of the educational agenda and goals that have been set for black children in public schools and have articulated arguments for alternatives to resolving the disparities between the performances of black and white students in schools and on standardized tests. 89

Chief among these criticisms is a denouncement of the integrationist ideal that was advanced by the NAACP and civil rights activists during the late 1950s and 1960s. 90 For today’s black conservatives, this ideal was damaging to the advancement of Blacks in education, not because integration itself was a harmful goal, but because too much emphasis was placed on that goal as opposed to the objective of actually improving the learning conditions of black children and the quality of their education. 91

Indeed, in the midst of the Civil Rights Movement, some black conservatives, such as Robert Woodson, broke with the Movement on the issue of desegregation and forced busing, asserting that “[t]he issue was black empowerment, not integration, which should be an individual matter, not one of public policy.” 92 Furthermore, to black conservatives, such as Woodson, the focus on integration not only withdrew attention from the poor quality of education that was available to individual black students, but it also taught Blacks that they should not want to live near each other or attend school together. 93

89 See, e.g., Thomas Sowell, Dems, GOPers, and Blacks II, JEWISH WORLD REV., Oct. 2, 2000 (arguing that Blacks are “more likely to gain from vouchers that would enable them to pull their children out of failing public schools”), available at http://www.jewishworldreview.com.

90 Some liberals have made similar criticisms, including Derrick Bell, whose new book Silent Covenants critiques civil rights leaders for their misguided approach in believing that integration alone would solve the problems of unequal education for black children. See Silent Covenants: Brown v. Board of Education and the Unfulfilled Hopes for Racial Reform (2004); see also Angela Onwuachi-Willig, For Whom Does the Bell Toll: The Bell Tolls for Brown?, 103 MICH. L. REV. (forthcoming 2005) (reviewing Silent Covenants).

91 See Watts, supra note 67, at 208 (declaring that “[a]ffirmative action isn’t the problem . . . . Lousy education for black kids is the problem”).

92 Hill, supra note 63, at 30.

93 See id. DuBois also made this point in W.E. Burghardt DuBois, Does the Negro Need Separate Schools, 4 J. NEGRO EDUC. 328, 330 (1935) (“As it is today, American
As Malcolm X, who is often described as conservative by many black conservatives today, once expressed:

I just can’t see where if white people can go to a white classroom and there are no Negroes present and it doesn’t affect the academic diet they’re receiving, then I don’t see where an all-black classroom can be affected by the absence of white children. . . . So, what the integrationists, in my opinion, are saying, when they say that whites and blacks must go to school together, is that the whites are so much superior that just their presence in a black classroom balances it out.

In sum, for many black conservatives then and now, the fight was not for integration or against segregation that was by choice, but against segregation that was state-mandated.

Negroes almost universally disparage their own schools. They look down upon them; they often treat the Negro teachers in them with contempt; they refuse to work for their adequate support; and they refuse to join public movements to increase their efficiency.”).

As several authors have noted, however, such ideology neglects the realities of residential segregation, much of which is influenced by discriminatory real estate practices. See, e.g., Christopher E. Smith, Clarence Thomas: A Distinctive Justice, 28 SETON HALL L. REV. 1, 19 (1997). Furthermore, even when people, especially minorities, have chosen to live in particular area for racial reasons, such decision may have been based primarily on a desire to escape the reality racism within one’s own neighborhood as opposed to a rejection of integration. See ELLIS COSE, THE RAGE OF A PRIVILEGED CLASS 188 (1993) (“The pain of [black] professionals . . . is more often than not rooted in feelings of exclusion. In attempting to escape that pain, some blacks end up, in effect, inviting increased isolation. When the successful black lawyer declares that he will ‘go to my own people for acceptance’ because he no longer expects approbation from whites, he is not only expressing solidarity with other members of his race, he is also conceding defeat. He is saying that he is giving up hope of ever being anything but a talented ‘nigger’ to many of his white colleagues, that he refuses to invest emotionally in those who will never quite see him as one of them, whatever his personal and professional attributes.”).

In response to a question regarding how Proposition 54, a 2003 initiative to ban the collection of race data by the state, could negatively affect integration efforts in the public schools in California, black conservative Ward Connerly once answered, “I don’t Indeed, some black conservatives viewed the decision in Brown v. Board of Education,\(^97\) which ordered the end of all state-mandated segregation, as insulting. For example, Zora Neale Hurston, who is most famous for her book Their Eyes Were Watching God, once exclaimed:

> The whole matter revolves around the self-respect of my people. How much satisfaction can I get from a court order for somebody to associate with me who does not wish me near them? I regard the ruling of the United States Supreme Court as insulting, rather than honoring my race.\(^98\)

Others such as Ward Connerly have gone farther, once stating in response to a question about his opinion of Senator Trent Lott, “Supporting segregation need not be racist. One can believe in segregation and believe in equality of the races.”\(^99\) For the most part, however, black conservatives simply believe that, when the emphasis is placed on diversity in schools as opposed to strengthening the schools in predominantly black neighborhoods, it is black children who always lose out and gain nothing.

3. Affirmative Action

Of all pressing social issues today, black conservatives have care whether they are segregated or not. . . kids need to be learning, and I place more value on these kids getting educated than I do on whether we have some racial balancing or not.” Editorial, Initiative Could Hurt Integration, S.F. CHRON., Sept. 2, 2003, at A16. The initiative, which Connerly drafted, was defeated by voters in a near 2-to-1 margin (with 5,071,565 votes (63.9%) against the initiative and 2,868,976 (36.1%) for the initiative) in the October gubernatorial-recall election that resulted in Arnold Schwarzenegger’s becoming Governor of California. See Steve Miller, Affirmative Action Backers Push for Connerly’s Ouster, WASH. TIMES, Nov. 30, 2003.

\(^97\) 347 U.S. 483 (1954).

\(^98\) James T. Patterson, Brown v. Board of Education: A Civil Rights Milestone and Its Troubled Legacy xxvii (2001); see also Steele, Content of Our Character, supra note 24, at 165 (“There is no magic that will make development happen. We [Blacks] simply have to want more for ourselves, be willing to work for it, and not use our enemy—old or new—as an excuse not to pursue it. It doesn’t really matter that Southern accents in Southern airports make me remember. What’s important is that I can travel.”).

\(^99\) Interview on Wolf Blitzer Reports (CNN broadcast Dec. 13, 2002).
received the most attention from the media and public on the debate regarding race-based affirmative action.\textsuperscript{100} For example, in 1996, Ward Connerly, a member of the University of California Board of Regents and President of the American Civil Rights Institute, drew national attention to black conservative thought when he successfully headed the California Civil Rights Initiative, also known as Proposition 209, an initiative that banned the consideration of race in education, employment, and contracting for all state institutions.\textsuperscript{101}

Although many black conservatives today agree that the discrimination that Blacks have faced and still face should be included in the discussion of how to address inequities in education, they disagree as to whether the short-term solution of race-based affirmative action is an \textsuperscript{100} By “affirmative action,” I refer to the act of extending preferential treatment to underrepresented racial minorities in hiring and recruitment. See Anupam Chander, Minorities, Shareholders, and Otherwise, 113 YALE L.J. 119, 120 n.3 (2003) (defining affirmative action “as minority-mindedness in decisionmaking resulting in . . . a preference”); West, supra note 26, at 614 (describing affirmative action as a “program or policy where race, national origin, or gender is taken into account”).

\textsuperscript{101} The University of California-Berkeley Office of Student Research reports that Proposition 209 has resulted in severe drops in black, Chicano, Latino, and Native American enrollment in the University of California’s top schools and graduate schools. According to the office, in the fall of 2003 first-year undergraduate class, only 211 (4.2%) black, 430 (8.5%) Chicano, 161 (3.2%) Latino, and 25 (0.5%) Native American students registered as first-years at the University of California-Berkeley (out of 8,796 applicants). See UC Berkeley Undergraduate Fact Sheet—Fall 2003, available at http://osr4.berkeley.edu/Public/STUDENT.DATA/PUBLICATIONS/UG/ugf03.html#table%207. In the fall of 1996, before the end of affirmative action, 324 (5.7%) black, 517 (10.3%) Chicano, 218, (4.3%) Latino, and 68 (1.4%) Native American students registered at as first years at the University of California-Berkeley. See Berkeley Undergraduate Fact Sheet-Fall 1996, available at http://osr4.berkeley.edu/Public/STUDENT.DATA/PUBLICATIONS/FACT.SHEET/f act96.pdf; see also Adrien Katherine Wing, Race-Based Affirmative Action in American Legal Education, 51 J. LEGAL EDUC. 443, 446 (2001) (reporting that, after the passage of Proposition 209, “[b]lack enrollment [at UC-Berkeley] dropped 95 percent, with just one black in the law class entering in 1997[,] Hispanic enrollment dropped 50 percent, and Native American 100 percent”); Bill Ong Hing, Beyond the Rhetoric of Assimilation and Cultural Pluralism: The Tension of Separatism and Conflict in an Immigration-Driven Multicultural Society, 81 CAL. L. REV. 863, 863 (1993) (noting that there has been a backlash against affirmative action since the 1980s).
appropriate way to address these inequities. To them, much like the focus on an integrative ideal, affirmative action does not ultimately help Blacks, but works only to hinder them. The dominant black conservative view is that “racial preferences allow society to leapfrog over the difficult problem of developing blacks to parity with whites and into a cosmetic diversity that covers the blemish of disparity,” when the real focus should be on a demand for parity between Blacks and Whites.

In other words, according to black conservative ideology, racial diversity is not tantamount to racial development for black people in education because all it does is allow Whites to create a picture of the ideal of diversity on campus by recruiting black and brown faces without regard to their actual learning and progress in classes and on tests. To 102 See, e.g., STEELE, A DREAM DEFERRED, supra note 24, at 5 (“Certainly no explanation of black difficulties would be remotely accurate were it to ignore racial victimization. On the other hand, victimization does not in fact explain the entire fate of blacks in America, nor does it entirely explain their difficulties today.”).

103 See STEELE, CONTENT OF OUR CHARACTER, supra note 24, at 115 (emphasis added) (“But the essential problem with this form of affirmative action is the way it leaps over the hard business of developing a formerly oppressed people to the point where they can achieve proportionate representation on their own (given equal opportunity) and goes straight for the proportionate representation. This may satisfy whites of their innocence and some blacks of their power, but it does very little to truly uplift blacks.”).

104 Id. at 116; see also Hill, supra note 63, at 31 (quoting Glenn Loury as stating that “[i]t will sound paradoxical to many people that affirmative action is not in the interests of ‘blacks’” but “in the longer term, preferential treatment is inconsistent with the attainment of fully equal status in society as independent contributors respected for their contribution by their fellow citizens”).

105 See STEELE, A DREAM DEFERRED, supra note 24, at 31 (“To have more college-educated minorities [people readily accept the idea] we don’t need to work at instilling the principle of intellectual excellence, or at raising the standards in inner-city schools, or at making minority neighborhoods safe for children. (In fact, we allow license and lowered standards to prevail in these areas.) . . . A group preference in college admissions is a simple and impersonal intervention by which we can manufacture a wonderfully “diverse” campus—even when black students average three hundred SAT points below whites and Asians, as has been the case at the University of California at Berkeley.”); STEELE, CONTENT OF OUR CHARACTER, supra note 24, at 121–24 (arguing that “preferential treatment does not teach skills, or educate, or instill motivation”).

106 STEELE, CONTENT OF OUR CHARACTER, supra note 24, at 116.

107 See STEELE, A DREAM DEFERRED, supra note 24, at 33; STEELE, CONTENT OF OUR CHARACTER, supra note 24, at 147 (“Black students have not sufficiently helped themselves, and universities, despite all their concessions, have not really done much for blacks. If both faced their anxieties, I think they would see the same things: academic the black conservative, affirmative action only sets up “unprepared” minority students for failure.\textsuperscript{108}

In contending with affirmative action, Black conservatives also focus on what they refer to as the demoralizing effect of the policy on Blacks—the feeling of inferiority by black students about their ability to compete with their white peers.\textsuperscript{109} According to black conservatives, this effect, combined with the cultural myth of black inferiority, is devastating parity with all other groups should be the overriding mission of black students, and it should also be the first goal that universities have for their black students. Blacks can only know they are as good as others when they are, in fact, as good—when their grades are higher and their dropout rate lower. Nothing under the sun will substitute for this, and no amount of concessions will bring it about.”).\textsuperscript{108} See McWhorter, supra note 82, at 141 (“The Bakke decision has taught a generation of young Americans that black students are more important for their presence in promotional brochure photographs than for their scholastic qualifications. . . . This ultimately perpetuates the very underperformance that has made the fig-leaf ‘diversity’ notion necessary.”); THOMAS SOWELL, A PERSONAL ODYSSEY 182–87 (2000) (describing his experiences as an economics professor at Cornell University where he witnessed black students with lower test scores struggle with their academic work). Of course, such arguments lose their force if one challenges the legitimacy of traditional standards of merit, such as standardized tests that correlate with wealth, and not necessarily with performance. See Lani Guinier, Admissions Rituals as Political Acts: Guardians at the Gates of Our Democratic Ideals, 117 HARV. L. REV. 113, 214-24 (2003) (detailing upper middle-class bias in admissions and asserting that “[q]uantitative measures often reflect family resources and influence rather than a student’s resourcefulness or intelligence”); Susan Sturm & Lani Guinier, The Future of Affirmative Action: Reclaiming the Innovative Ideal, 84 CAL. L. REV. 953, 969 (1996) (indicating that standardized tests do not identify qualities important for the education the test takers seek); see also Richard Lempert, David Chambers, & Terry Adams, Michigan’s Minority Graduates in Practice: The River Runs Through Law School, 25 LAW & SOC. INQUIRY 395, 401-02, 492-503 (2000) (same).

\textsuperscript{109} STEELE, CONTENT OF OUR CHARACTER, supra note 24, at 116. Many beneficiaries of affirmative action, however, do not suffer the same stigma as Thomas did. As several scholars have argued, any stigma outweighs the negatives. See Laura M. Padilla, Intersectionality and Positionality: Situating Women of Color in the Affirmative Action Dialogue, 66 FORDHAM L. REV. 843, 880 (1997) (“Furthermore, any stigma-attached downside to affirmative action does not outweigh the upside of providing opportunities for women of color that would not otherwise exist.”). Moreover, many supporters of affirmative note that Blacks have been stigmatized since the founding of this country. See Eva Jefferson Patterson, Affirmative Action and the California Civil Wrongs Initiative, 27 GOLDEN GATE U. L. REV. 327, 334 (1997) (“Stigmatize [us], give [us] that degree.’ [It’s not] [a]s though if you don’t have the Berkeley degree you’re not stigmatized as a black person.”).
to black students\textsuperscript{110} because it encourages reliance on Whites as opposed to self-reliance.

Additionally, black conservatives believe that affirmative action creates a perverse incentive to remain a victim, especially to middle class and upper middle class Blacks, who are then presented with a motivation either to underperform or not to push themselves because of the fear of losing their “advantage” in the admissions game.\textsuperscript{111} Furthermore, they contend that affirmative action unfairly helps the black middle class,\textsuperscript{112} whom they do view as not experiencing any serious disadvantage,\textsuperscript{113} and not helping poor Blacks, who have a stronger need for affirmative action.\textsuperscript{114} In sum, for the black conservative, the real focus should be on economic disadvantage.\textsuperscript{115}

\textsuperscript{110} See \textit{id.} at 134 (“So when a black student enters college, the myth of inferiority compounds the normal anxiousness over whether he or she will be good enough.”).

\textsuperscript{111} \textit{Id.} at 119.

\textsuperscript{112} See \textit{STEELE, A DREAM DEFERRED, supra} note 24, at 126-27 (noting that “[w]hen the University of California was forced to drop race-based affirmative action, a study was done to see if a needs-based policy would bring in a similar number of blacks” and discovered that “the top quartile of black American students–often from two-parent families with six-figure incomes and private school educations–is frequently not competitive with whites and Asians even from lower quartiles”).

\textsuperscript{113} \textit{STEELE, CONTENT OF OUR CHARACTER, supra} note 24, at 142 (noting that “the real challenge is not simply to include a certain number of blacks, but to end discrimination against all blacks and to offer special help to those with talent who have also been economically deprived”); see \textit{WATTS, supra} note 67, at 206 (arguing for class-based affirmative action).

\textsuperscript{114} See \textit{STEELE, CONTENT OF OUR CHARACTER, supra} note 24, at 139 (“Of course poor and working-class blacks do not get preferences . . . because preferences go almost exclusively to the wealthiest and best-educated blacks.”).

\textsuperscript{115} See Armstrong Williams, Supreme Court Hands Down Affirmative Action Decision, June 23, 2003, available at http://www.townhall.com/columnists/Armstrongwilliams/aw20030623.shtml (“These are the people affirmative action needs to be helping - those poor minority students who are conditioned to believe that they have no chance at achieving the American dream. By the time these kids reach high school it is too late for them to take advantage of affirmative action because they have already given up.”). Such a position, however, ignores the fact that, when wealth is defined in terms broader than just income alone, including assets, prestige of job and education level required for job, savings, retirement, and so on, Blacks and Latinos are far from being in the same position as Whites. \textit{See generally MELVIN OLIVER & THOMAS SHAPIRO, BLACK WEALTH/WHITE WEALTH: A NEW PERSPECTIVE ON RACIAL EQUALITY 100-110 (1995)} (asserting that when factors other than income are included, black families are significantly worse off than white families with similar incomes); see also R. Richard Finally, black conservatives oppose affirmative action because they believe that it stigmatizes Blacks in the eyes of Whites by reinforcing stereotypes of Blacks as inferior and less intelligent than Whites. To them, the program simply feeds the flame as opposed to extinguishing it. Underlying all of these views on affirmative action is the black conservative’s belief that white liberals support affirmative action while believing Blacks to be truly incompetent and then “sneer at the idea that affirmative action stigmatize[s] women and minorities as incompetent.”

In the eyes of black conservatives, the liberal bias in favor of racial preferences is based on and continues to exist only because of an inference of black inferiority. In essence, in black conservative thought, the hypocrisy of white liberals is in the idea that they would not ask their own child to accept the benefits of affirmative action in place of concrete improvement in test scores and grades. As former Professor Shelby Banks, Meritocratic Values and Racial Outcomes: Defending Class-Based College Admissions, 79 N.C. L. Rev. 1029, 167 (2001) (pointing out that “middle-class blacks hold dramatically less wealth than whites with comparable education and income” and that “[l]ow socioeconomic status whites, as measured by education and income, have a wealth-holding comparable to middle class blacks”).

116 Id. at 120. George Schuyler once expressed a similar argument in relation to his opposition of the NAACP’s boycott of white-owned stores in Harlem in 1934. The boycott was based on the slogan “Don’t buy where you can’t work.” In attacking the boycott, Schuyler asserted the following:

The Negro, characteristically enough, is unprepared for it. . . . An insistence upon employment on a racial basis alone will be re-echoed with avidity by jobless whites and professional Anglo-Saxons. The color bar in industry hits the Negro hard enough without him laboring to make his lot worse. . . . [T]he boycott ballyhooers are clearly asking us to cut off our heads to cure a cold.

117 As Professor Shelby Steele has argued, “Much of the ‘subtle’ discrimination that blacks talk about is often (not always) discrimination against the stigma of questionable competence that affirmative action delivers to blacks.” Steele, Content of Our Character, supra note 24, at 141.

118 Steele, A Dream Deferred, supra note 24, at 5.

119 See id. at 20 (“Would he [a white journalist] have encouraged his own children to overcome a deficit by looking for a preference? Did he think a preference built esteem or undermined it?”).
Steele once mocked, “[T]he liberal who has high expectations for his or her own children often feels that he or she cannot ‘push the issue’ with blacks.” Moreover, black conservatives contend that such “preferences . . . give up on black excellence in order to preserve white excellence.”

After all, “[i]f black equality were truly the goal, wouldn’t policy focus on educational development before college?” In sum, black conservatives view affirmative action as not truly helping to resolve the problems that cause black underperformance in schools and on standardized tests, and only assuaging the guilt of liberal Whites.

4. Crime

Like their white counterparts, black conservatives strongly advocate toughness on criminals and strict law abidance without significant regard to mitigating factors. Unlike their white counterparts, however, whose focus is on accountability and recognizing the harm to victims, black conservatives place a strong emphasis on punishing criminals not just because it protects victims, but specifically because they believe it protects black victims. Moreover, for black conservatives, harsh punishment of criminals is critical to the advancement of Blacks not only because it would better protect Blacks, (who remain especially vulnerable to criminal wrongdoing and corruption because of a lack of financial resources and weak police protections), but also because it

120 See id. at 34.
121 See id. at 160; see also Hill, supra note 63, at 41 (quoting Thomas as asserting “[w]hite parents tell their kids to study hard and get into college, and black kids are told they don’t have to worry about their SAT scores”).
122 See id. at 33.
123 See Richard Delgado, supra note 58 at 1548-49 (describing Steele’s description of racial programs, such as affirmative action, as programs that enable Whites to feel good about themselves while actually doing little for Blacks).
125 Although not a self-identified conservative, Randall Kennedy has expressed views on criminal matters that are more in line with black conservatism. See, e.g., Randall Kennedy, The State, Criminal Law, and Racial Discrimination: A Comment, 107 HARV. L. REV. 1255, 1256 (1994) (arguing that there has been a failure to protect black communities).
126 See Kennedy, supra note 125, at 1256.
would serve as a method for distancing “good” Blacks from the negative stereotypes that are used to support police brutality, racial discrimination in law enforcement, and racial profiling.

This central tenet of black conservative thought on crime first began to emerge during the antebellum period when free Blacks, who tended to be more conservative, viewed their survival and the maintenance of their status (however low it was) as dependent upon distinguishing themselves from enslaved Blacks. This attitude even extended into the post-bellum period when there was no need for such distinctions to be made between free Blacks and slaves. For example, these “politics of distinction” played themselves out in the Davis Bend Court, an old slave court in Mississippi. This slave court was created by Joseph Davis, a slave master who owned and ran a plantation on the banks of the Mississippi and later helped to found the Mississippi Bar Association. Called the “Hall of Justice,” the slave court was in session every Saturday with Davis, with a jury of slaves issuing judgments after hearing and receiving evidence at trial. In one session on the court after the

---

127 Randall Kennedy, A Response To Professor Cole’s “Paradox of Race and Crime,” 83 GEO. L.J. 2573, 2574-75 (1995) (describing support of some black members of Congress for harsh sentences to deter crack usage); Glenn C. Loury, Listen to the Black Community, PUB. INT., Fall 1994, at 33, 35-36 (encouraging blacks to promote punishment of lawbreakers).

128 Randolph, supra note 31, at 151.

130 This phrase was coined by Professor Regina Austin, who defined the phrase as highlighting “the difference that exists between the ‘better’ elements of and the stereotypical ‘lowlifes’ who richly merit the bad reputations the dominant society accords them.” Regina Austin, The Black Community, Its Lawbreakers, and a Politics of Identification, 65 S. CAL. L. REV. 1769, 1772 (1992). Professor Austin opposed such distinctions in the black community.

131 See Katherine Franke, Subjects of Freedom (unpublished manuscript at 72-73, on file with author) (citing Freedmen’s Court, Davis Bend, Record Court of Freedmen, Davis Bend, Miss., RG 105, Entry 2153, NA); see also Janet Sharp Hermann, The Pursuit of a Dream 6, 62-64 (1981).

132 See Franke, supra note 131 (unpublished manuscript at 60-62, on file with author) (citing Varina Howell Davis, Jefferson Davis: Ex-President of the Confederate States of America, A Memoir 1, 49-50, 174 (1890)). Davis intervened “only to grant a pardon if he regarded the sentence as too severe. Id.
emancipation of slaves, a “judge” of the Davis Bend Court of Freedom, a rare court of colored men which continued to render decisions on crimes committed by newly freed slaves,\footnote{See id. (unpublished manuscript at 72, on file with author) On July 4, 1863, Admiral David Porter, commander of the Union fleet on the Mississippi, ordered that Davis Bend be made an independent colony for freed slaves. The former slaves who resided at Davis Bend when Davis was the slave master continued the court system. The court system was formally established in January of 1865 and consisted of three judges, who were elected every three months, and who tried all the cases that were brought before them. See id. (citing Freedmen’s Court, Davis Bend, Record Court of Freedmen, Davis Bend, Miss., RG 105, Entry 2153, NA).} emphasized the “politics of distinction” while chastising a mother who had been charged with stealing a bag of corn:

Now you listen, you. You and your mother are a couple of low-down darkies, trying to get a living without work. You are the cause that respectable colored people are slandered, and called thieving and lazy niggers.\footnote{Id. (citing JOHN T. TROWBRIDGE, THE SOUTH: A TOUR OF ITS BATTLE-FIELDS AND RUINED CITIES, A JOURNEY THROUGH THE DESOLATED STATES, AND TALKS WITH THE PEOPLE 383 (1866)).}

Such politics of distinctions have continued today, as noted above, with black conservatives urging an emphasis on distinguishing law-breaking Blacks with those who are law-abiding.\footnote{Randolph, supra note 31, at 153 (quoting WILLARD B. GATEWOOD, ARISTOCRATS OF COLOR (1993)). Basically, like Washington’s philosophy during the post-Reconstruction period, during the antebellum and post-bellum period, some of the black elite, who were primarily “conservative,” believed that “if it were not for the behavior of the masses, the better class of whites would extend to the black elite the full privileges of citizenship.” See id.}

In addition to viewing a hard stance against crime as a means of distinguishing law-abiding Blacks from black criminals, black conservatives also regard such a stance as necessary for ensuring the protection of the persons who are often left out of debates concerning race and the criminal justice system: black victims of crime.\footnote{See Thomas Sowell, Easy Justice (August 12, 2003) (arguing that “[i]nnocent victims of crime seem to disappear from the lofty vision and ringing rhetoric of those who worry that the punishment of criminals is ‘too severe’”), available at http://www.townhall.com/columnists/thomassowell/ts20030812.shtml.} As opposed to analyzing how some Blacks may turn to crime as a reaction to poverty and institutionalized racism, black conservative ideology focuses on the black victim, noting how Blacks are much more vulnerable to violent and non-violent crimes than Whites. To the black conservative, the fact that most poor Blacks never turn to crime and that Blacks are seven times more likely to be murdered, four times more likely to be raped, three times more likely to be robbed, and twice more likely to be assaulted than Whites dictates that Blacks be nothing but harsh on criminals.

According to black conservative thought, the effects of such crime

---

137 See Brian W. Jones, Two Visions of Black Leadership, in BLACK AND RIGHT: THE BOLD NEW VOICE OF BLACK CONSERVATIVES IN AMERICA 41 (1997) (criticizing liberal black leaders for concentrating procedural protections for the accused and rationalizing the “victimizer’s behavior with arguments about racism and economic determination”).

138 See Thomas Sowell, “Friends” of Blacks: Part II, JEWISH WORLD REV. (Sept. 6, 2000), available at http://www.jewishworldreview.com. At the same time, the fact that Blacks are more likely to be victims of crime than Whites does not necessarily mean that harsher punishment will benefit the community. In fact, it could exacerbate the problem. As Professor Davis Cole has argued:

> Even if one were willing, in the name of the “politics of distinction,” to write off the black lawbreakers, the impact extends to the black community at large. Incarceration of so many young black men contributes to the very problems that are so often pointed to as the source of higher crime rates in the black community. More than 30% of black families have incomes below the poverty level, as compared with 9% of white families. Minorities’ median net worth is less than 7% that of whites. Unemployment among African-Americans is about twice that among whites. More than half of all African-American children are living only with their mothers, as compared with 14% of white children. By removing so many black men from the community and stigmatizing them forever with a criminal conviction, criminal law enforcement is likely to mean more single-parent families, less adult supervision of children, more unemployed and unemployable members of the community, more poverty, and in turn, more drugs, more crime, and more violence. This is not to minimize the burden that criminals themselves present to the community. It is simply to suggest that incarceration—especially on such a massive scale in a well-defined community—is far from an adequate solution, and may well exacerbate the problems associated with crack and crime.

Davis Cole, The Paradox of Race and Crime: A Comment on Randall Kennedy’s “Politics of Distinction,” 83 GEO. L.J. 2547, 2558 (1995) (also noting that “[b]lack citizens living in the inner city are disproportionately victimized by crime, but they are also disproportionately victimized by law enforcement”). to the members of these communities are incredibly devastating, often leaving innocent, law-abiding black citizens as prisoners in their own homes and resulting in severe economic consequences, such as higher insurance rates, higher prices for goods in black communities with costly security devices, and the dearth of stores, banks, and other financial institutions in black communities. As black conservatives dictate, Blacks must demand that their communities be made safe and secure through the strict enforcement of laws that penalize criminals instead of coddling them.

Indeed, black conservatives have linked this concept with their support of the death penalty, again emphasizing the “politics of distinction” by claiming that the “real victims” in capital cases are law-abiding members of the black community, who are denied equal protection under the law of the death penalty because persons who kill Whites are significantly more likely than those who kill Blacks to receive the death penalty. Furthermore, in capital cases, black conservatives advocate not allowing jurors discretion in deciding the fate of such defendants on the ground that this discretion only allows racism to determine who receives a life sentence and who receives a death sentence. To black conservatives, the only way to protect individual black 139 See Sowell, supra note 136 (criticizing Justice Kennedy for his condemnation of mandatory sentencing laws and noting that “[i]f a day in prison can be pretty long, so can every day living in a high-crime neighborhood, where you have to wonder what is going to happen to your son or daughter on the way to or from school”); Hill, supra note 63, at 37.

Clarence Thomas once argued the following in an interview:

The sections where the poorest people live aren’t really livable. If people can’t go to school, or rear their families, or go to church without being mugged, how much progress can you expect in a community? Would you do business in a community that looks like an armed camp, where the only people who inhabit the streets after dark are the criminals. . . . If you want to encourage business in these areas then stopping crime has got to be at the top of the list.

Quoted in Hill, supra note 63, at 37.

140 See Randall Kennedy, McKleskey v. Kemp: Race, Capital Punishment, and the Supreme Court, 101 HARV. L. REV. 1388, 1421-43 (1988). In McKleskey v. Kemp, 481 U.S. 279 (1987), a study revealed that “even after taking account of 39 nonracial variables, defendants charged with killing white victims were 4.3 times as likely to receive a death sentence as defendants charged with killing blacks.” Id. at 287.
defendants charged with murder is by eliminating such discretion so that all criminals are treated and judged the same. In essence, they oppose placing too much authority in the hands of individuals in criminal matters because, to their minds, in such instances, individual Blacks will always suffer because of racism, whether conscious or unconscious. In sum, for black conservatives, the emphasis should be placed on protecting law-abiding Blacks through the “politics of distinction” and strict law enforcement. Additionally, for black conservatives, black liberals’ support of discretion in considering mitigating social factors should be stopped because, contrary to what black liberals think, such discretion only harms black defendants by opening them to racism, instead of resulting in juror recognition of the effects of racism and life circumstances for each individual.

II. BIRTH OF A “NATIONALIST”: HOW CLARENCE THOMAS BECAME BLACK AND RIGHT

There is nothing you can do to get past black skin.

— Clarence Thomas

The evolution of Clarence Thomas into a black conservative, or as 141 Of course, such reasons ignore the racism that precedes a capital trial, including police targeting of black persons and the discretion of prosecutors in determining who will be charged with what crime, and if that charged crime should be a capital offense. See Angela J. Davis, Prosecution and Race: The Power and Privilege of Discretion, 67 FORDHAM L. REV. 13, 26-33 (1998) (discussing how racism, both unconscious and conscious, results in discriminatory treatment of Blacks by police and prosecutors); Angela J. Davis, Benign Neglect of Racism in the Criminal Justice System, 94 MICH. L. REV. 1660, 1674-84 (1996) (same); Christopher E. Smith, The Supreme Court and Ethnicity, 69 OR. L. REV. 797, 830 (1990) (noting that “[p]rosecutors make subjective decisions, based on a complex variety of factors, about whether to seek the death penalty’’); see also Cole, supra note 138, at 2566 (“Racial stereotypes are likely to influence the police officer’s decision about whom to watch or stop, the prosecutor’s decision about which charges to pursue, the judge’s decision about whether to set bail, the jury’s decision to convict, the judge’s sentence, and the parole board’s decision on early release.”).

142 Such views are in line with black conservative views on other issues, such as affirmative action, which rest on the idea that the only way for Blacks to ensure fairness is to eliminate “subjective” decisionmaking from the process.

143 Williams, A Question of Fairness, supra note 56, at 72.
some would argue, the ultimate cultural dissenter, provides one of the most interesting chronicles of racial identity development in United States. Sociologists and psychologists have long studied the construction of race in society and its impact on an individual’s identity. In 1994, Michael Omi and Howard Winant introduced racial formation theory, which refers to the “sociohistorical process by which racial categories are created, inhabited, transformed, and destroyed.” Specifically, this theory provides that race is not a fixed term, but is instead an evolving set of social meanings that are formed and transformed under a constantly shifting society. In essence, supporters of this school argue that race is a social factor.

Prior to Omi and Winant’s work, several psychologists examined the means through which individuals socially develop their racial identity, in particular black identity. William Cross, professor of psychology at the University of Massachusetts-Amherst, was among the first to examine the psychological development of black identity in 1971. In so doing, Cross outlined a process he termed “nigrescence,” which is the pattern through which individuals become “Black” in terms of one’s manner of thinking about and evaluating oneself and one’s reference

---

144 Sunder, supra note 30, at 497 n.6 (citing Maureen Dowd, Liberties: Black and White, N.Y. TIMES, Feb. 14, 2001, at A31, in which Justice Clarence Thomas is quoted as saying “the war in which we are engaged is cultural, not civil”); see also Smith & Walton, Jr., supra note 30, at 215 (stating that “[c]onservatives in black America are dissenters from the mainstream left/liberal ideological consensus that characterizes the community”).

147 OMI & WINANT, supra note 146, at 55.

149 See JANET E. HELMS, BLACK AND WHITE RACIAL IDENTITY: THEORY, RESEARCH AND, PRACTICE 3 (Janet E. Helm ed. 1990) (stating that “the term ‘racial identity’ actually refers to a sense of group or collective identity based on one’s perception that he or she shares a common racial heritage with a particular racial group”).
group. Scholars, such as Janet Helms, professor of counseling psychology and director of The Institute for the Study and Promotion of Race and Culture at Boston College, have expounded upon Professor Cross’s theory of racial identity development. As Professor Helms explains in her book, Black and White Racial Identity: Theory, Research and, Practice, the impact of racial identity on any particular individual is complex. Within any racial group, “various kinds of racial identity can exist, and consequently, racial consciousness per se usually is not considered to be dichotomous, present, or absent, but rather is polytomous.”

Indeed, the rise in the number of black conservatives in today’s society displays exactly the varied nature of black racial identity and consciousness. On a more specific note, the mere existence of Clarence Thomas, one of the most prominent members of the Black Right, reflects exactly how a person who strongly identifies as a black can cultivate values and beliefs in ways that differ from the vast majority of members in his or her racial group.

In fact, despite Justice Thomas’s conservative views, which some have argued are antithetical to black identity, there is no doubt that his 151 Professor Janet Helms was among the first academics to study the development of white racial identity. See generally Helms, supra note 149.

---

152 Helms, supra note 149, at 7. David Demo and Michael Hughes also expounded upon Cross’s work on black identity, arguing that black identity is a multidimensional concept that encompasses a wide array of feelings, including closeness to other Blacks and a commitment to African and African-American culture.” David Demo & Michael Hughes, Socialization and Racial Identity Among Black Americans, 53 SOC. PYSC. Q. 364–74 (1990).

153 Thomas, supra note 30, at 9 (asserting that “policies affecting black Americans had been an all-consuming interest of [his] since the age of sixteen”).

154 Cf. Watts, supra note 67, at 248 (asking “[w]hy can’t a black man or woman espouse a more conservative viewpoint . . . and still ‘reflect the African-American community’”).

155 See, e.g., Jack E. White, Uncle Tom Justice, TIME, June 26, 1995, at 36 (asserting that no “true” black person would hold Justice Thomas’s views); see also Smith, supra note 7, at 528 (claiming that some persons have argued that Justice Thomas is not a “real” black man).
life has been marred by racism, racial hierarchy, and economic inequality. More important, it is clear, as Justice Thomas has expressed himself, that race and racism have played a significant role in shaping his persona.\textsuperscript{156} A brief recounting of part of his life story demonstrates as much, in the particular the manner in which he arguably may have progressed through the stages of nigrescence, as developed by Professor Cross and other black scholars such as Professor Beverly Daniel Tatum.\textsuperscript{157} Professor Cross’s nigrescence model involves five stages of racial identity development: (1) pre-encounter, (2) encounter, (3) immersion, (4) internalization, and (5) internalization-commitment.\textsuperscript{158}

\textsuperscript{156} Indeed, Justice Thomas himself has described the importance of racial experiences in the development of his ideology, noting that, at certain points, his “attitudes approached black nationalism” and citing leaders such as Malcolm X, Richard Wright, Frederick Douglass, and Booker T. Washington as some of his heroes. See Clarence Thomas, \textit{Interview with Bill Kaufman}, \textit{Reason Online}, available at www.reason.com/cthomasint.shtml.

\textsuperscript{157} The nigrescence model has been criticized for various reasons, including its tendency to simplify the development of racial identity as a simple process of increasing racial identification and its identification of an emotionally healthy racial identity for Blacks as being one that centered around Afrocentrism. See Camille Gear Rich, \textit{Performing Racial and Ethnic Identity: Discrimination by Proxy and the Future of Title VII}, 79 N.Y.U. L. REV. 1134, 1174-75 (2004). Nevertheless, I briefly discuss this model because it is the most well-known of the racial identity development models.

\textsuperscript{158} \textbf{BEVERLY DANIEL TATUM, WHY ARE ALL THE BLACK KIDS SITTING TOGETHER IN THE CAFETERIA? AND OTHER CONVERSATIONS ABOUT RACE} 76 (1997) (highlighting the five stages of nigrescence and extending it to cover a youth in their phases of racial identity development); Cross & Fhagen-Smith, \textit{supra} note 150, at 244 (same); see also Bailey W. Jackson III, \textit{Black Identity Development: Further Analysis and Elaboration, in NEW PERSPECTIVES ON RACIAL IDENTITY DEVELOPMENT} 15-16 (2001) (Charmaine L. Wiejeyesinghe & Bailey W. Jackson eds.) (describing the stages of black identity development as being naïve or absence of social consciousness or identity; acceptance, meaning acceptance of the perceived worth of black people and black culture; resistance or the rejection of prevailing white culture’s description and valuing of black people; redefinition or the renaming, reaffirming, and reclaiming of one’s sense of blackness, black culture, and racial identity; and internalization, meaning the integration of redefined racial identity into aspects of one’s identity).

During the first stage, the pre-encounter stage, the black individual views the world from a white frame of reference and internalizes many of the beliefs and values of the dominant white culture, including the idea that whiteness is superior. In this stage, the black individual has not yet recognized the societal significance of his or her membership in a racial group. See Tatum, \textit{supra} note 158, at 76. Under the nigrescence model, an individual graduates to the second stage, the encounter stage, when an event or series of
As noted earlier, one could argue that Justice Thomas has gone through each of the stages of nigriscence throughout his life. Thomas began his life poor and destitute in the segregated town of Pin Point, Georgia in 1949. When Thomas was two years old, his father abandoned him, his brother, and his mother who was pregnant with her third child, a girl. In 1954, the same year that Brown v. Board of Education\(^{159}\) was decided, Thomas started first grade at the segregated Haven Home School.

In 1955, because Thomas’s mother could no longer afford to raise and keep all of her children, Thomas and his brother went to live (without their sister) with their grandfather, Myers Anderson (“Anderson”), and their grandmother Christine Anderson in Savannah, Georgia.\(^{160}\) Although events causes that individual to acknowledge the personal impact of racism. In this stage, the individual begins to struggle with the idea of what it means to be a member of a group targeted by racism. See TATUM, supra note 158, at 76; see also Cross & Fhagen-Smith, supra note 150, at 244 (describing this stage as depicting “the event or series of events that challenge and destabilize ongoing identity).

During the third stage, the immersion stage, the black individual begins to unlearn the negative stereotypes about Blacks in the United States and starts to develop a positive sense of self. This development is often accompanied with anger from the individual regarding racism by Whites and a strong desire to surround oneself with symbols of racial identity. During this stage, a black individual is engaged in self-discovery, actively seeks out knowledge about his or her own racial and cultural history, and unlearns many of the negative stereotypes that were internalized during the pre-encounter stage. Eventually, the individual’s anger is subsided in the fourth stage of development, internalization, where the individual develops a sense of security about his or her own racial identity. See id.; see also Cross & Fhagen-Smith, supra note 150, at 244 (describing the stage as signaling “the habitation, stabilization, and finalization of the new sense of self”). As this stage progresses, the individual begins to establish meaningful relationships across boundaries, including with Whites. Finally, in the fifth stage, internalization-commitment, which is described as being minimally distinct from the fourth stage, the black individual is anchored in a positive sense of racial identity. More importantly, he or she has discovered methods for transforming his or her “sense of identity into ongoing action expressing a sense of commitment to the concerns of Blacks as a group.” See TATUM, supra note 158, at 76; see also Cross & Fhagen-Smith, supra note 150, at 244 (describing a person in the fifth stage as achieving “a strong Black identity at the personal level” and then “join[ing] with others in the community for long-term struggles to solve Black problems and to research, protect, and propagate Black history and Black culture”).

\(^{159}\) 347 U.S. 483 (1954).

\(^{160}\) See GREENYA, supra note 5, at 30-31; see also Nomination of Clarence Thomas to Be Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States: Hearings Before the Comm. on the Judiciary, 102nd Cong. 108 (1991) [hereinafter Hearings] (testimony of barely able to read and write himself, Anderson was a strong supporter of education and managed to earn enough money to send Thomas to an all-black Catholic school.161

It was in these Catholic schools and a Catholic seminary that Thomas arguably entered into the first two stages of nigrescence, the pre-encounter and encounter stages. When Thomas reached the tenth grade, he began to attend an all-white Catholic boarding school called St. John Vianney Minor Seminary and, for the first time, experienced “culture shock.”162 Thomas once described his first day at the all-white school, saying “When I walked in there and saw I was in a room with all these white kids, I just about died.”163

Despite having to adjust to a strange, all-white environment, Thomas excelled as a student and an athlete at St. John Vianney.164 His social successes at the school, however, were far more limited, primarily because of racism. Thomas’s white classmates at St. John Vianney repeatedly teased him, at times telling him, “Smile, Clarence, so we can Clarence Thomas) (“Our mother only earned $20 every two weeks as a maid, not enough to take care of us. So she arranged for us to live with our grandparents later, in 1955. Imagine, if you will, two little boys with all their belongings in two grocery bags.”). As Thomas has repeatedly stated, he gained the morals and values that have served as the foundation for his success in the Anderson household. Although lacking formal education, Anderson, who, unlike many Blacks at that time, had built and owned his own house, was also a strong proponent of self-reliance. See GREENYA, supra note 5, at 32; see also Evelyn Alicia Lewis, Struggling with Quicksand: The Ins and Outs of Cotenant Possession Value Liability and a Call for Default Rule Reform, 1994 WIS. L. REV. 331, 334 (1994) (noting that “it was remarkable that [her] grandmother had had any property at all; a divorced, Black woman who’d raised three daughters alone in the segregated South with not even a high school education”).

161 Like his grandfather and grandmother, who raised Thomas in their home, Justice Thomas is now raising his great-nephew Mark. Justice Thomas assumed custody over Mark after his father was convicted of drug charges in 1997. See GREENYA, supra note 5, at 16; Tony Mauro, Decade After Confirmation, Thomas Becoming a Force on High Court, FULTON CTY. DAILY REPORT, Aug. 20, 2001, at 1.

164 Williams, A Question of Fairness, supra note 56, at 74.
see you.”165 For Thomas, who had been ridiculed as a child for his “nigger naps” and routinely called “America’s Blackest Child,”166 the taunts were painful.167 During his tenure at St. John Vianney, Thomas entered what he has described as a “self-hate” stage,168 going to great lengths to fit in with his white classmates and internalizing racism.169 At the same time, Thomas seemed to enter into what can be described as the second stage of nigrescence, encounter, where such series of taunts and racial events caused him to recognize fully the impact of racism. Indeed, ultimately Thomas’s efforts to gain acceptance from his classmates would be of no avail, and Thomas would eventually come to believe that “there is nothing a black man can do to be accepted by whites.”170

At Immaculate Conception Seminary in Missouri, where Thomas enrolled after high school to become a priest, he continued through what could be defined as the encounter stage, struggling with the idea of what it means to be Black and thus a constant target of racism. In fact, Thomas’s stay at the seminary, would be brief as result of this struggle with targeted racism, with Thomas leaving soon after hearing a white classmate and future priest declare the following about the shooting of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.: “Good, I hope the son of a bitch dies.”171 According to Thomas, after overhearing this statement, he “knew [he] couldn’t stay in that so-called Christian environment any longer.”172

As Thomas pursued his education at Holy Cross College in

---

165 See GREENYA, supra note 5, at 44.
166 See Williams, A Question of Fairness, supra note 56, at 74. Since the antebellum period, there has been serious intraracial discrimination among Blacks based upon skin tone. See generally MIDGE WILSON ET AL., THE COLOR COMPLEX (1993); see also Trina Jones, Shades of Brown, The Law of Skin Color, 49 DUKE L.J. 1487, 1515-22 (2000) (detailing the history of colorism within the black community).
167 See Williams, A Question of Fairness, supra note 56, at 74.
168 Id.
169 See id.
170 Quoted in Williams, A Question of Fairness, supra note 56, at 74.
171 GREENYA, supra note 5, at 48. As a general matter, Thomas felt that the Church was ignoring critical issues of race. As Thomas once explained of his departure from the seminary, “dogs were being sicced on blacks . . . and the church was focusing on what songs to play at services.” Hill, supra note 63, at 28 (quotations omitted).
172 GREENYA, supra note 5, at 48-49 (explaining that “[t]his was a man of God, mortally stricken by an assassin’s bullet, and one preparing for the priesthood had wished evil on him”). As Thomas would explain many years later, the day Martin Luther King, Jr. was shot was a “demarcation between hope and hopelessness” for him. Id.
Worcester, Massachusetts,\textsuperscript{173} he arguably moved into the third stage of nigrescence, immersion, where he began to unlearn negative stereotypes about Blacks, developed anger about racism by Whites, and surrounded himself with symbols of racial identity.\textsuperscript{174} Indeed, at Holy Cross, Thomas embraced Black Nationalism,\textsuperscript{175} helped to found the Black Student Union, and became involved with programs sponsored by the Black Panthers,\textsuperscript{176} such as its free breakfast programs for black children. Thomas also led a walkout at Holy Cross over the issue of divestment from South Africa, which at that time had a system of apartheid.\textsuperscript{177}

\textsuperscript{173} Thomas attended Holy Cross with the assistance of a Martin Luther King Scholarship that was aimed at attracting more high-achieving black students to the college. See Greenya, supra note 5, at 54 (stating that in the late 1960s, Holy Cross “pushed to find and admit more black students under a relatively new policy known as affirmative action”).

\textsuperscript{174} See Williams, A Question of Fairness, supra note 56, at 74.

\textsuperscript{175} Black Nationalism is a complex set of beliefs emphasizing the need for the cultural, political, and economic separation of African Americans from white society. The Black Nationalist movement, which can be traced back to Marcus Garvey’s Universal Negro Improvement Association of the 1920s, sought to acquire economic power and to infuse among Blacks a sense of community and group feeling. As an alternative to being assimilated by the American nation, which is predominantly white, black nationalists sought to maintain and promote their separate identity as a people of black ancestry. See Farrar, supra note 57, at 110-14.

\textsuperscript{176} Greenya, supra note 5, at 57. The Black Panther Party was a radical, black political organization that was founded by Huey P. Newton in 1966 with friends, Bobby Seale and David Hilliard. The Party outlined a Ten Point Platform and Program, which called for a redress of the longstanding grievances of the black masses in America, including full employment for all black people, overdue payment of forty acres and two mules, decent housing, decent education that teaches black children of their history, free health care, an end to police brutality, freedom of all blacks from government correctional facilities, and assurance of trials by a jury of actual peers for all Blacks. See Cynthia Deitle Leonardatos, California’s Attempt to Disarm the Black Panthers, 36 San Diego L. Rev. 956-60 (1999).

According to Thomas, he was so militant, “[H]e thought George McGovern was a conservative.” Kevin Merida & Michael A. Fletcher, Supreme Discomfort, Wash. Post, Aug. 4, 2002, at 23. Although Thomas considered himself liberal and a militant during his days at Holy Cross, he was the sole dissenter to a proposal for a black dormitory/hall on campus. Thomas eventually decided to live in the black dormitory/hall, but brought his white roommate from the previous year to live with him. Greenya, supra note 5, at 60 (noting that Thomas dissented in part “because he didn’t want to make it easy for whites to avoid him”).

\textsuperscript{177} Apartheid, which means “apartness,” is the name given to a policy of segregation by race in South Africa that began in 1948, but the policy itself extends back
Just as Thomas had done in primary and secondary school, he excelled in his classes at Holy Cross. In spite of his academic successes, however, Thomas was not a vocal participant in the classroom. As Thomas would later explain, he did not voluntarily speak in the classroom in high school, college, and later law school because of the discomfort he felt as a result of his childhood speech.\textsuperscript{178} As Thomas explained, he had grown up in a rural area of the South where there remained a major influence of Gullah, a mixture of English and African language.\textsuperscript{179} As a consequence, while he learned to speak standard English, he would edit his speech and his words before speaking, which resulted in his doing more listening than speaking.\textsuperscript{180}

After graduating ninth in his class from Holy Cross, Thomas attended Yale Law School. At Yale, Thomas’s militancy began to dwindle, and his opposition to affirmative action policies, particularly quotas, began to grow.\textsuperscript{181} Thomas felt stigmatized by what he believed to \textsuperscript{178} See Greenya, supra note 5, at 20, 56 (“One reason for my being inconspicuous was that I had difficulty speaking proper English. . . . I would think about the right way to phrase a question while I was trying to say it, and trip over myself. Some people thought I had a stuttering problem. So I remained quiet.”).

\textsuperscript{179} See Greenya, supra note 5, at 20, 56 (describing Thomas’s stated reasons for his silence on the bench); see also Ken Foskett, Judging Thomas: The Life and Times of Clarence Thomas 3 (2004) (describing Gullah culture).

\textsuperscript{180} See Greenya, supra note 5, at 20, 56; see also Scott D. Gerber, “My Rookie Years Are Over” Clarence Thomas After Ten Years, 10 Am. U. J. Gender Soc. Pol’y & L. 343, 349-50 (2002).

\textsuperscript{181} See Williams, A Question of Fairness, supra note 56, at 75 (detailing an interview with Thomas, in which he described his feelings at Yale).
be his white classmates’ view that black law students at Yale were not there because of their academic qualifications, but merely to fulfill a quota. As Thomas later explained about his days at Yale, “You had to prove yourself every day because the presumption was that you were dumb and didn’t deserve to be there on merit.” Indeed, Thomas felt so stigmatized by what he perceived as his classmates’ opinions that he avoided classes in civil rights and constitutional law, instead opting to take tax law, corporate, and antitrust law, to prove his abilities.

See id.

Quoted in GREENYA, supra note 5, at 68, 94 (stating that Thomas described his experience as being one in which “every time [he] walked into a law class at Yale it was like having a monkey jump down [his] back from the Gothic arches”). Additionally, as Thomas saw it, at Yale, affirmative action primarily assisted only middle class blacks, not the masses. According to Thomas, most of the Blacks who graduated from Yale were the children of black lawyers, doctors, and teachers. See Williams, A Question of Fairness, supra note 56, at 75 (“Man, quotas are for the black middle class. But look at what’s happening to the masses. Those are my people. They are just where they were before any of these policies.”); Neil A. Lewis, Thomas’s Journey on Path of Self-Help, N.Y. Times, July 6, 1991 (noting that at Yale, Thomas was “usually attired in bib overalls and a dark wool watch cap, as if to announce he was a man of the common folk”); see also GREENYA, supra note 5, at 68 (same).

See Williams, A Question of Fairness, supra note 56, at 75 (noting that Thomas purposefully avoided civil rights classes). As Professor Dorothy Brown has shown, however, even tax law is affected by race. See Dorothy A. Brown, Racial Equality in the Twenty-First Century: What’s Tax Policy Got to Do with It?, 21 U. ARK. LITTLE ROCK L. REV. 759, 760-68 (1999) (analyzing how certain tax statutes have a disparate impact based on race). The same holds true for corporate law. See, e.g., Thomas W. Joo, A Trip Through the Maze of “Corporate Democracy”: Shareholder Voice and Management Composition, 77 ST. JOHN’S L. REV. 735, 738-48 (2003) (discussing the lack of diversity among corporate directors and the executive officers they appoint and how diversity would contribute to better management decision making and greater shareholder wealth).

See Williams, A Question of Fairness, supra note 56, at 75 (describing Thomas’s comments that he shunned civil rights courses because he did not want to be viewed as a student who was admitted and must be coddled because he is black). To this today, Justice Thomas holds on to this belief. The Justice once advised a young black male from a housing project, who planned to attend Brown University, to avoid “classes and orientation on race relations.” He explained to the youth, “What I look for in hiring my clerks—the cream of the crop—I look for the math and sciences, real classes, none of that Afro-American study stuff. If they’d taken that stuff as an undergraduate, I don’t want them.” Quoted in Calmore, supra note 21, at 212–13 (quoting David G. Savage, Justice Thomas Defined by His Roots, and Distance from Them—Though Jurist Hails from a Humble Background, He Refuses to Let His Experiences Influence His Court
Upon his graduation from Yale, one of the country’s most elite law schools, in 1974, Thomas found himself jobless. He had been rejected by every law firm in Atlanta. None of the law firms were hiring black law school graduates as attorneys, even if they graduated from Yale Law School. It was at this point that one could argue Thomas entered the fourth stage of nigrescence, internalization, where he began to develop a sense of security about his racial identity and began to establish meaningful relationships across racial boundaries, with perhaps the most important being one with John Danforth, a Yale alumnus and then the Republican Attorney General of Missouri, who hired Thomas to serve as counsel for the state department of revenue and the tax commission.

In 1975, Thomas furthered his break with the black left as he discovered the work of Thomas Sowell, a black conservative economist. In 1980, Thomas would enter what seemed to be the last and final stage of nigrescence, internalization-commitment, after being invited by Sowell to the Fairmont Conference in San Francisco, California, a conference for black conservatives who were seeking “an alternative to the consistently leftist thinking of the civil rights leadership and the general black leadership.” At this conference, Thomas found his home, thereby beginning his entrenchment in the Republican Party and developing an ideology and course of action for addressing his concerns about the plight of individuals in the black community.

See Stephen Henderson, Clarence Thomas Urges UGA Law Graduates to Persevere, MACON TELEGRAPH, May 18, 2003, at 1; see also GREENYA, supra note 5, at 70 (quoting Thomas as saying “Prospective employers dismissed our grades and diplomas . . . assuming we got both primarily because of preferential treatment”). According to Justice Thomas, he still possesses the rejection letters from law firms in Atlanta. See id.

See Henderson, supra note 186, at 1.

See Williams, A Question of Fairness, supra note 56, at 75.

See Thomas, supra note 30, at 5.

Id.; GREENYA, supra note 5, at 89 (stating that “Sowell’s main thesis of black self-sufficiency and avoidance . . . of ‘victimization mentality’ resonated deeply within the still-young Clarence Thomas”). Thomas described his experience at and after the conference as both uplifting and depressing. He stated, “For those of us who had wandered in the desert of political and ideological alienation, we had found a home, we had found each other. For me, this was also the beginning of public exposure that would change my life and raise my blood pressure and anxiety level. After returning from San
In 1981, Ronald Reagan appointed Thomas to serve as the assistant secretary for the Civil Rights Division in the Department of Education. According to Thomas, he “initially resisted and declined taking the position of assistant secretary for civil rights simply because [his] career was not in civil rights and [he] had no intention of moving into th[e] area.” Although Thomas was sure that his appointment was due to his race, he ultimately decided to accept the position upon persuasion from friends. According to Thomas, during his tenure as assistant secretary, he held “strategy meetings among blacks who were interested in approaching the problems of minorities and who were willing to admit error and redirect their energies in a positive way.”

After spending only ten months in the position at the Department of Education, Thomas was then promoted to become the Chair of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (“EEOC”). The Reagan Administration’s failure to view Thomas as anything other than a black man, however, became clear upon the confirmation to a second term as Chairman of the EEOC. At the confirmation, the then-Assistant Attorney General Brad Reynolds toasted Thomas, declaring that Thomas was “the epitome of the right kind of affirmative action working the right way.”

On July 11, 1989, the first President Bush nominated Clarence Thomas to the United States Court of Appeals of the D.C. Circuit. Less than two years later, on July 1, 1991, President Bush then nominated Judge Clarence Thomas to succeed Associate Justice Thurgood Marshall, who had just resigned from the Supreme Court days before. Former Francisco, the Washington Post printed a major op-ed article about me and my views presented at the ‘Fairmont Conference.’ Essentially, the article listed my opposition to affirmative action as well as my concerns about welfare. The resulting outcry was consistently negative.”

Thomas, supra note 30, at 6.

See Greenya, supra note 6, at 90.

Thomas, supra note 30, at 6; see also Williams, A Question of Fairness, supra note 56, at 75.

See Greenya, supra note 5, at 90; see also Andrew Peyton Thomas, Clarence Thomas: A Biography 186 (2001).

Thomas, supra note 30, at 6.

See Greenya, supra note 5, at 90.

Quoted in Merida & Fletcher, supra note 176, at 24; see also Greenya, supra note 5, at 127.

See Greenya, supra note 5, at 149.

President Bush asserted that Thomas was “the best qualified person for the job on the merits” behind snickers that Thomas’s lack of judicial experience and his law school record hardly made him qualified for the job.

Although an overall majority of Blacks supported Clarence Thomas’s nomination to the Court, his nomination caused an uproar among some prominent feminist and minority civil rights groups.

---

200 Quoted in Justice Clarence Thomas, A Classic Example of an Affirmative Action Baby, J. BLACKS HIGHER. EDUC., Jan., 31, 1998, at 36; see also Greenya, supra note 5, at 171 (stating that President Bush was supposed to refer to Judge Thomas as the “best man” for the job instead of the “best qualified”). Many of Thomas’s critics contend that his appointment to the bench was the result of “affirmative action.” For example, at the time of Thomas’s appointment, Democratic Senator Joseph Biden stated, “Had Thomas been white, he never would have been nominated. The only reason he is on the Court is because he is black.” Id.; see also Edward Lazarus, Making Sense of Thomas’ Cross Burning Remarks and First Amendment Law (noting “that Thomas’s qualifications, compared to those of other potential candidates, were limited”), available at www.cnn.com/2002/LAW/12/26/findlaw.analysis.lazarus.thomas.

201 See Maureen Dowd, Could Thomas Be Right?, N.Y. TIMES, June 25, 2003, at 25 (mocking that “Thomas was nominated by the first President Bush with the preposterous claim that he was the ‘best qualified’ man for the job”); Christopher Edley Jr., Doubting Thomas: Law, Politics and Hypocrisy, WASH. POST, July 7, 1991, at B1 (arguing that Thomas professionally less distinguished than all the Justices except Kennedy and Souter).

202 Polls showed that anywhere from 50% to 70% of Blacks supported Thomas’s nomination. See Peggy Peterman, Most Blacks Glad Thomas Confirmed, Now Want Him to Change, ST. PETERSBURG TIMES, Oct. 17, 1991, at 13A (“[M]ore [black people] were for Clarence Thomas than were against him, but it’s close… [A] sizable number of black people say they simply want an African-American on the U.S. Supreme Court. If it’s got to be a tarnished Clarence Thomas, so be it. That’s what happens when it takes so long for a group of people, such as African-Americans, to get recognition.”). The reasons for supporting Thomas varied. Some Blacks believed that Thomas would prove to be an advocate for civil rights while on the bench. Others were more skeptical, such as Joseph Lowery of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, a supporter who explained that he was willing to support Thomas during his confirmation hearings “because [he] figured that if a white man named [Hugo] Black could learn to think colored, then a Negro named Tom might learn to think black.” Jeffrey Rosen, Moving On, NEW YORKER, Apr. 29 & May 6, 1996, at 68.

203 See Joyce A. Baugh & Christopher E. Smith, Doubting Thomas: Confirmation Veracity Meets Performance Reality, 19 SEATTLE U. L. REV. 455, 467 (1996) (describing several feminist organizations that opposed Thomas). Even in everyday public circumstances, Justice Thomas draws harsh criticisms from his challengers. For instance, while standing in a public library with childhood friend Lester Johnson, a woman approached Justice Thomas and his company to say “I just wanted to see what a group of especially after allegations of sexual harassment from Anita Hill, a black female graduate of Yale Law School graduate who had worked with Thomas at the Department of Education and the EEOC. Hill claimed that Thomas sexually harassed her during her tenure in those departments. After Hill’s sexual harassment charge was leaked to the press, Congress presided over public hearings that questioned both Thomas and Hill about the charge.

In response to the challenges to his nomination and appointment, Thomas famously called the Thomas-Hill hearings a "Uncle Toms look like.” Merida & Fletcher, supra note 176, at 8. Additionally, Leonard Small, a childhood friend of Justice Clarence Thomas, said of him, “People don’t understand why we call people Uncle Toms. . . . But in the novel [Uncle Tom’s Cabin], Eliza ran from slavery and Uncle Tom stayed. While we are trying to run for freedom, Clarence Thomas is not only staying, he’s telling.” Id. at 27.

Thomas was also heavily criticized for how he lambasted his sister in public. Thomas once said of his sister, “She gets mad when the mailman is late with her welfare check.” Williams, A Question of Fairness, supra note 56, at 75; see also GREENYA, supra note 5, at 17. At the time, Thomas made these comments about his sister, she was not on welfare. Thomas’s sister later explained why she had ever been on public assistance, stating that “[w]hen she was on welfare . . . she was not only taking care of her kids but had responsibility for her elderly aunt, who raised her, and an uncle.” Merida & Fletcher, supra note 176, at 28. To her, her choice was simple–“[She] had a choice of taking care of these old people or keeping a job.” See id.

Thomas was also heavily criticized for how he lambasted his sister in public. Thomas once said of his sister, “She gets mad when the mailman is late with her welfare check.” Williams, A Question of Fairness, supra note 56, at 75; see also GREENYA, supra note 5, at 17. At the time, Thomas made these comments about his sister, she was not on welfare. Thomas’s sister later explained why she had ever been on public assistance, stating that “[w]hen she was on welfare . . . she was not only taking care of her kids but had responsibility for her elderly aunt, who raised her, and an uncle.” Merida & Fletcher, supra note 176, at 28. To her, her choice was simple–“[She] had a choice of taking care of these old people or keeping a job.” See id.

206 The Latino/a community is experiencing a similar debate regarding the nomination of Miguel Estrada to the United States D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals. Indeed, Estrada has been called “a Justice Clarence Thomas in the making, a young lawyer thrust toward the Supreme Court as a conservative ideologue no more representative of Hispanics than Thomas was of blacks.” Frank Davies, Bush Court Nominee Raises Liberal Hackles – Critics Characterize Honduran-American as Far-Right Ideologue Lacking In Experience, STAR LEDGER, Jan. 6, 2002, at 29. Many liberals hope that “Latino groups will learn from the lessons of the Clarence Thomas nomination, eschew the misguided racialist solidarity that entrapped many African Americans, and do the right thing . . . [which is] oppos[e] the nomination of Miguel Estrada.” Calmore, “high-tech lynching for uppity blacks who in any way deign to think for themselves.” In so doing, he abandoned black conservatives’ rejection of what they call victimology and has been heavily criticized by many persons for claiming racism after chastising others for doing the same in the past. Despite Hill’s allegations of harassment and the extreme opposition to Thomas’s confirmation by prominent organizations on the left, Thomas was confirmed as an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court. His confirmation was by the narrowest margin in modern history, 52-48.

The enormous support that Thomas received from the first President

---

207 Hearings, supra note 160, at 157 (testimony of Clarence Thomas). Thomas further claimed that the hearings regarding Hill’s allegations were “a message that you [meaning Blacks] kow-tow to an old order, this is what will happen to you, you will be lynched, destroyed, caricatured by a committee of the U.S. Senate, rather than hung from a tree.” Hearings, supra note 160, at 157 (testimony of Clarence Thomas).

208 See, e.g., Donna Britt, Those Fateful, Hateful Hearings, WASH. Post, Oct. 15, 1991, at E01 (“What else do I hate? The warp speed with which bootstrapper extraordinaire Clarence Thomas adopts the pose of black victim whenever it suits him.”); Brent Staples, Lynching, as Surreal Slogan, N.Y. TIMES, Oct. 17, 1991 (“Judge Thomas has consistently played the race card. . . . Clarence Thomas has always benefited from his race and victimization. It’s just that he has made his case slyly, in subtext, most recently with his sharecropper grandfather in the starring role. . . . Who lynched whom? Judge Thomas’s appeal to that brutal imagery was at once his shrewdest and most deplorable tactic.”). Many individuals have criticized Thomas for “playing the race card” by claiming to be a victim of a “high-tech lynching” during his confirmation hearings, not only because Thomas sought to downplay his race in his professional life, but also because Thomas’s accuser was not a white, but a black, woman. See Merida & Fletcher, supra note 176, at 11 (quoting five black law professors at University of North Carolina as stating “in a nation ‘in which African Americans are disproportionately poor, undereducated, imprisoned and politically compromised . . ., identity–racial identity–very clearly matters. Were that not the case, Justice Thomas, for all his claims to the contrary, could not have declared himself the victim of a ‘high-tech lynching’ during the heated opposition to his appointment to the Supreme Court’”); see also Kendall Ford, Strange Fruit, in RACE-ING JUSTICE, EN-GENDERING POWER: ESSAYS ON ANITA HILL, CLARENCE THOMAS, AND THE CONSTRUCTION OF SOCIAL REALITY (Toni Morrison ed., 1992), at 364 (noting the irony in Thomas claiming a lynching when the alleged victim was a black woman); Eleanor Clift, McLaughlin Group (October 12, 1991) (“Using racism when civil rights organizations oppose him, when his accuser is black, and when he himself has walked away from the civil rights movement and affirmative action is really intellectual dishonesty. . . . [Anita Hill] has done nothing to suggest she has a credibility problem, whereas Clarence Thomas has done a lot to suggest that he can lie pretty easily.”).

209 See Foskett, supra note 179, at 47.
Bush’s administration, as well as many prominent white Republican Congressmen and politicians, only worked to heighten suspicions among the black community. One of the most vocal critics of Thomas both before and after his nomination was the highly regarded Judge Leon Higginbotham, the late federal judge from the United States Third Circuit Court of Appeals. In fact, after Thomas was seated on the Court, Judge Higginbotham published a letter to Justice Thomas in the University of Pennsylvania Law Review that condemned the Justice for his critique of civil rights organizations and lawyers and urged Justice Thomas to use his new role to “assure equal justice under laws for all persons.”

---

210 George H.W. Bush and his administration had been heavily criticized for having “racist” politics. For example, Bush was lambasted for utilizing a demonized image of Willie Horton in television advertisements during his campaign as a means of engendering fear in middle and upper class white Americans. Willie Horton was a black criminal who, while on a work release program of the Dukakis governorship, raped and murdered a white woman. See Richard Dvorak, Cracking the Code: “De-coding” Racial Slurs During the Congressional Crack Cocaine Debates, 5 Mich. J. R. & L. 626-27 (2000) (describing how former President Bush used Willie Horton to appeal to Whites’ racism and fear of black male criminals).

211 In defense of Justice Thomas, Republican Senator Danforth, a friend and former supervisor, asserted, “What Clarence is all about . . . is that in this country you should have the freedom to think what you want to think, whether you’re black, white, or anything else.” David Gergen, The Brief on Clarence Thomas, U.S. News & World Report, July 15, 1991. Additionally, David Duke, a “former” white supremacist openly declared support for Thomas’s nomination. Likewise, Strom Thurmond, a once staunch segregationist, became one of Thomas’s strongest supporters. See Hearings, supra note 160, at 22-25 (testimony of Clarence Thomas).

212 See Smith, supra note 81, at 11 (stating “there is something wrong when white men rally around a black man. Why would all these white senators rally around this black man? After all, this is America.”).

During his confirmation hearings, Clarence Thomas asserted that he recognized the sacrifices that many civil rights activists had made for him, stating:

So many others gave their lives, their blood, their talents. But for them I would not have been here. Justice Marshall, whose seat I have been nominated to fill, is one of those who had the courage and the intellect. He is one of the great architects of the legal battles to open doors that seemed so hopelessly and permanently sealed and to knock down barriers that seemed so insurmountable to those of us in the Pin Point, Georgias of the world.
In contrast to the white conservative community, which has consistently praised Justice Thomas as one of the brightest judicial figures, much of the black community has largely ignored or ridiculed the Justice.\textsuperscript{214} Numerous protests and challenges to Justice Thomas’s appearance at several events indicate that it is unlikely that any wholesale approval of the Justice from the much of black community will occur in the near future.\textsuperscript{215}

The civil rights movement, Reverend Martin Luther King and the SCLC, Roy Wilkins and the NAACP, Whitney Young and the Urban League, Fannie Lou Hamer, Rosa Parks and Dorothy Hite, they changed society and made it reach out and affirmatively help. I have benefited greatly from their efforts. But for them there would have been no road to travel. \textit{Hearings, supra} note 160, at 109 (testimony of Clarence Thomas)).

\textsuperscript{214} Calmore, \textit{supra} note 21, at 180. For example, for the past seven years, Ebony Magazine has not listed Justice Thomas as one of the 100 most influential African-Americans. Thomas has been consistently ridiculed within the black and liberal communities. For example, Emerge Magazine twice parodied the Justice on its cover. In the first cartoon, Thomas was wearing an Aunt Jemima-style headscarf. In the second cartoon, Thomas was pictured as a lawn jockey standing in front of the Supreme Court. Inside the pages of the magazine, there was drawing of Clarence Thomas shining the shoes of Justice Scalia. \textit{See} George E. Curry & Trevor W. Coleman, \textit{Uncle Thomas: Lawn Jockey of the Far Right}, EMERGE, Nov. 1996, at 38.

\textsuperscript{215} Most recently, on February 28, 2002, five black law professors at the University of North Carolina boycotted Justice Thomas’s visit to the law school. These law professors have been named “The Law School Five.” Along with their boycott, the five professors issued a statement. It reads in part:

On Wednesday, March 6, 2002, Clarence Thomas, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, will visit the University of North Carolina School of Law. Plans for his visit include a breakfast with students, lunch and coffee with the faculty, visits to selected classes, and an afternoon appearance at the Carolina Club. And while many law students, faculty, staff, and alumni are expected to participate in the day’s events, we the law school’s five African-American faculty members will not join them. Although it has been reported in the local press that the law school is “delighted” to have Justice Thomas visit, we emphatically do not share that delight.

For many people who hold legitimate expectations for racial equality and social justice, Justice Thomas personifies the cruel irony of the fireboat burning and sinking. For some--certainly, for us--his visit adds insult to injury. We note, parenthetically, that Justice Thomas follows the recent visits of Justices Scalia and O’Connor. Thus, within the last few years the law school will have brought to the Thomas’s own reaction to the protests against his appearances exhibits his hurt at being shunned and rejected by the black community. In 1998, Justice Thomas spoke at the annual convention of the National Bar Association, the largest organization of black attorneys and judges, after much protest and debate. In his speech to the members of the campus three of the five justices who have voted consistently to turn back the clock on racial progress.

We live, today, in a United States that increasingly calls on African Americans to disavow the salience of race in American life, to claim that identity doesn’t matter, and that race consciousness in any and every form is pernicious, even when it seeks to rectify racial wrongs. But in a United States in which African Americans are disproportionately poor, undereducated, imprisoned, and politically compromised, identity--racial identity--very clearly matters. Were that not the case, Justice Thomas, for all his claims to the contrary, could not have declared himself the victim of a “high-tech lynching” during the heated opposition to his appointment to the Supreme Court.

Accordingly, Justice Thomas is not just another Supreme Court justice with whom we disagree. Rather, as a justice, he not only engages in acts that harm other African Americans like himself, but also gives aid, comfort, and racial legitimacy to acts and doctrines of others that harm African Americans unlike himself—that is, those who have not yet reaped the benefits of civil rights laws, including affirmative action, and who have not yet received the benefits of the white-conservative sponsorships that now empower him. . . .

Calmore, supra note 21, at 225 (Appendix).

See Richard Willing, Black Jurist Conference Begins with Controversy, USA TODAY, Sept. 25, 1998, at 7A. Numerous members of the National Bar Association complained and protested after its Chairman publicly announced the invitation for Justice Thomas to speak at the organization’s annual convention. Id. Judge A. Leon Higginbotham was among those who tried to have Thomas disinvited to the meeting. In a letter circulated before the convention, he wrote, “It makes no more sense to invite Clarence Thomas than it would have for the National Bar Association to invite George Wallace for dinner the day after he stood in the schoolhouse door and shouted ‘Segregation today and segregation forever.’” Quoted in Mona Charen, Rejection Is Price Thomas Pays for Keeping Integrity, FT. WORTH TELEGRAM, Aug. 2, 1998, at 4. Despite this strong protest, several prominent black legal figures, came to Justice Thomas’s aid, most notably Judge Damon Keith, United States Circuit Judge for the Sixth Circuit. In fact, Judge Keith defended the invitation that was extended to the Justice, and the invitation was not withdrawn. Indeed, Justice Thomas refused to cancel his appearance at the convention. See Vern Smith & Ellis Cose, The Obligations of Race, NEWSWEEK, Aug. 10, 1998, at 53.

The National Bar Association’s annual conference and the University of North Carolina have not been the only places where an appearance by Clarence Thomas has National Bar Association, Justice Thomas defended his right to “think for himself.” In his highly charged speech, he asserted:

It pains me deeply—more deeply than any of you can imagine—to be perceived by so many members of my race as doing them harm, all the sacrifice, all the long hours of preparation were to help, not hurt. . . . I have come here today not in anger or to anger, though my mere presence has been sufficient, obviously to anger some, nor have I come to defend my views, but rather to assert my right to think for myself, to refuse to have my ideas assigned to me, as though I was an intellectual slave.

Clearly, Justice Thomas identifies strongly as a black man and believes that his ideologies are best suited to aid Blacks, but thus far, he has failed to meet the challenge convincing others that he is not a puppet of “forces hostile to his own people.”

been boycotted by members of the black community. For example, in 1996, school officials at a predominantly black middle school in Landover, Maryland revoked an invitation for Justice Thomas to speak at the school’s eighth grade graduation. Parents and children successfully rallied to get Justice Thomas reinvited as a speaker. See Jackie Cissell, Justice Clarence Thomas: He’s Not Going Away, No Matter How Hard His Critics Pray, NEW VISIONS COMMENT., at 1. Likewise, two black board members of the American Civil Liberties Union of Hawaii resigned after the organization invited Justice Thomas to speak in a debate on affirmative action. See Merida & Fletcher, supra note 176, at 11. One of the black board members, Eric Ferrer, proclaimed that inviting Justice Thomas would be like “inviting Hitler to come speak on the rights of Jews.” Id. at 11; Calmore, supra note 21, at 180.

218 Id.

219 It is clear from his words that Justice Thomas is hurt by his ostracism from the black community. Essayist Debra Dickerson said the following about the Justice after she engaged in long conversations with him about the difficulties that black Republicans face: “I think he would clearly love his relationship with the black community to be different . . . There is a wistfulness there. You can’t be outside of the fold and not feel it. . . . He is the lowest of the low in sort of official blackdom. It’s unfair, and it’s got to hurt.” Quoted in Merida & Fletcher, supra note 176, at 11.

220 Hill, supra note 63, at 28.
III. BLACK ROBE, BLACK VOICE

Although many Blacks and Whites refuse to see Justice Thomas as anything other than an “Uncle Tom,” his jurisprudence on certain issues, regardless of whether one views his ideologies as beneficial to black people, speaks volumes as to whether he is a “slave” of any white conservative, including Justice Scalia. In particular, when considered in light of the philosophies that have developed into black conservative thought, which focuses on the effects of certain policies and programs on black people as opposed to mere principles of formal equality, one can readily see that Justice Thomas’s jurisprudence on issues, such as education and desegregation, affirmative action, and crime, are rooted in black conservative ideology. This Part evaluates and analyzes selected Supreme Court opinions and explicates how Justice Thomas embraces various strands of black conservative thought (as distinct from white conservative ideology) in his opinions.

A. Education/Desegregation

I am the only one at this table who attended a segregated school. And the problem with segregation was not that we didn’t have white people in our class. The problem was that we didn’t have equal facilities. We didn’t have heating, we didn’t have books, and we had rickety chairs. All society owed us was equal resources and an equal opportunity to make something of ourselves.

–Clarence Thomas, in 1995 at the Justices’ conference in which Missouri v. Jenkins was discussed

As noted earlier, a significant component of black conservative thought on education is its critique of the strategy that was employed by civil rights activists in their efforts to improve the lot of black children in public schools. For many black conservatives (and even to some black 221 Justice Thomas is not the only person to be labeled a traitor to the race. Many other black conservatives, including J.C. Watts, Colin Powell, Condoleezza Rice, and Shelby Steele “have been labeled expedients, Uncle Toms, oreos, [and] sell-outs.” See WATTS, supra note 67, at 3.

222 Quoted in Rosen, supra note 202, at 66.
223 See supra Part I(B)(2).
liberals today, \textsuperscript{224} this strategy focused far too much on an integrative ideal, and not enough on improving the actual educational opportunities and resources available to black children.\textsuperscript{225}

More importantly, this idea that the past civil rights strategy improperly relied on the belief that integration in itself was the solution to educational inequalities is one that Justice Thomas has expressed repeatedly, both on and off the bench. For example, even before Thomas sat on the Court, he articulated these very same criticisms, stating:

There were grand opportunities for them to focus on the proper education of minority kids, the kids who are getting the worst education, and instead they’re talking about integration. God–I went to segregated schools. You can really learn how to read off those books, even if white folks aren’t there. I think segregation is bad, I think it’s wrong, it’s immoral. I’d fight against it with every breath in my body, but you don’t need to sit next to a white person to learn how to read and write. The NAACP needs to say that.\textsuperscript{226}

Additionally, in response to a question by Senator Specter during his confirmation hearings on September 16, 1991, Thomas asserted:

The concern that a number of us raise with respect to just as individuals in this society, as individuals who have watched the changes in our country, was simply that if we could demonstrate that the educational opportunities were \textsuperscript{224} See, e.g., Alex M. Johnson, Jr, \textit{Bid Whist, Tonk, and United States v. Fordice: Why Integrationism Fails African-Americans Again}, 81 \textit{Cal. L. Rev.} 1401 (1993). Derrick Bell, professor of law at New York University School of Law, has even asserted that he would have dissented from \textit{Brown}, arguing that the Court should have enforced \textit{Plessy v. Ferguson}, 163 U.S. 537 (1896), which established the concept of separate but equal.

\textsuperscript{225} See Hill, \textit{supra} note 63, at 30.

\textsuperscript{226} Quoted in Bill Kauffman, \textit{Clarence Thomas}, available at http://reason.com/cthomasint.shtml; see also Greenya, \textit{supra} note 5, at 33 (noting that Thomas stated that the nuns in the all-black school he attended gave “the same tests the white schools took” and that “[t]hey refused to let [Thomas and his classmates] buy into the notion that [they] could never do well, despite all the stereotypes of inferiority around [them]”).
improving for minorities, then whether it is busing or any other technique, then use it, but make sure that we are helping these young kids. That was totally out of the legal context. That just simply would have been a preference that I expressed as a citizen.\footnote{Hearings, supra note 160, at 489 (testimony of Thomas).}

As a Supreme Court Justice, Thomas received his first opportunity to insert these principles into his jurisprudence in \textit{United States v. Fordice}.\footnote{505 U.S. 717 (1992).} In \textit{Fordice}, a lawsuit was filed against the State of Mississippi, alleging that despite the Court’s decision in \textit{Brown v. Board of Education},\footnote{See \textit{Brown v. Board of Education}, 349 U.S. 294 (1955); \textit{Brown v. Board of Education}, 347 U.S. 483 (1954). In \textit{Brown I}, the Supreme Court held that state-mandated segregation in public educational institutions was unconstitutional, and in \textit{Brown II}, the Supreme Court ordered an end to segregated public education “with all deliberate speed.”} the state had continued its policy of \textit{de jure} segregation in its public university system by maintaining five almost completely white universities and three almost exclusively black universities. In filing this lawsuit, the plaintiffs referenced the state’s history of discrimination in its public university system.\footnote{See \textit{id.} at 723-25.} In particular, the plaintiffs specified that the University of Mississippi had only admitted its first black student in 1962, which was eight years after the first decision in \textit{Brown}, and even then only under court order.\footnote{See \textit{Meredith v. Fair}, 306 F.2d 374 (5th Cir.), \textit{cert. denied}, 371 U.S. 828 (1962).} Additionally, they explained that, although, in 1973, the state had devised a plan (one that was rejected by the United States Department of Health, Education, and Welfare) to disestablish the \textit{de jure} segregated university system, the state had refused to fund the plan until 1978, five years later, and even then with only half the amount requested.\footnote{See \textit{id.} at 722-23.} Finally, they concluded that, by the mid-1980s, more than ninety-nine percent of Mississippi’s white students were enrolled at the five almost completely white universities, and seventy-one percent of the state’s black students were enrolled at the three almost exclusively black universities.\footnote{See \textit{id.} at 724-25.}
affirmative duty to dismantle its prior dual university system, the Court first noted that a state does not satisfy “its constitutional obligations until it eradicates policies and practices traceable to its prior de jure dual system that continue to foster segregation.” The Court then held that the fact that college attendance is by choice in the higher education context is not sufficient in itself to show that a state has abandoned its dual, race-based system. “If policies traceable to the de jure system are still in force and have discriminatory effects, those policies too must be reformed to the extent practicable and consistent with sound educational practices.”

The Court further held that, had the Fifth Circuit applied the correct standard to the plaintiffs’ claims, it may have concluded that Mississippi’s policies regarding admissions standards, program duplication in the black and white institutions, and mission assignments, although race neutral, substantially restricted students’ choices of which institution to enter based on race and remanded the case.

Justice Thomas authored a concurrence in Fordice, agreeing with the majority’s ruling that a state does not satisfy its “obligation to dismantle a dual system of higher education merely by adopting race-neutral policies” and the standard that the majority had established for evaluating desegregation in the higher education context. In so doing, Justice Thomas began his concurrence with a quote from W.E.B. DuBois, who had once argued that all-black schools could be more conducive to advancing the learning of black children than integrated schools.

---

234 Id. at 728.
235 Id. at 729.
236 Id.
237 Id. at 732–43.
238 Id. at 745 (Thomas, J., concurring).
239 See id. at 745 (Thomas, J., concurring); see also W.E. Burghardt DuBois, Does the Negro Need Separate Schools, 4 J. NEGRO EDUC. 328 (1935). Justice Thomas’s reference to DuBois is ironic, given DuBois’s strong opposition to Washington. It is also ironic because DuBois’s argument, as clarified later, rested on the idea that Blacks should rally behind separate schools as a practical matter because of Whites’ hostility to Blacks. See id. at 330 (arguing that there must be separate schools “because of an attitude on the part of white people which is not going materially to change in our time”). In this sense, the segregation was not by choice, but by concession; it is segregation by individual choice that Justice Thomas does not contest and bases his jurisprudence on desegregation. See supra Part I; see also Sheryll Cashin, Middle-Class Black Suburbs and the State of Integration: A Post-Integrationist Vision for Metropolitan America, 86 CORNELL L. REV. 729, 730, 733-34 (2001) (maintaining that, for some of the black
Noting DuBois’s statement that “‘[w]e must rally to the defense of our schools,’” Thomas explained that he wrote a separate concurrence to emphasize that the standard applied in Fordice did not compel the elimination of racial balance within the system as required in the grade-school context and thus would not necessitate the “destruction of historically black colleges nor the severing of those institutions from their distinctive histories and traditions.”

Although Justice Thomas agreed that a court could assume discriminatory intent from policies adopted during the de jure era to produce segregative effects and that continued to produce such effects, he stressed the majority’s holding that these policies must be reformed and analyzed in accordance with sound educational practices. In so doing, Justice Thomas focused on historically black colleges and universities, noting their value in and of themselves despite the racist reasons behind the creation and development of many such colleges and universities. Furthermore, Justice Thomas expressed concern that, if courts foreclosed the possibility that there were sound educational justifications for maintaining historically black colleges and universities, such schools, which had maintained a significant value as a learning ground for numerous black leaders and allowed for the upward mobility of many Blacks, would be destroyed, ultimately depriving young black students of an opportunity to attend college. Again, as his fellow black conservatives have expressed over time, Justice Thomas expressed worry that black students would lose out on an important educational benefit simply for the sake of integration alone. As Justice Thomas noted, historically black colleges and universities are “a symbol of the highest attainments of black culture,” and “it would be ironic, to say the least, if the institutions that sustained blacks during segregation were themselves destroyed in an effort to combat its vestiges.”

Moreover, Justice Thomas’s focus in his concurrence was highly different from that of Justice Scalia, who concurred in part and dissenting in part. While Justice Scalia agreed that Mississippi was required under the Constitution to remove discriminatory barriers at its public universities and colleges, that this requirement did not mandate equal funding between the historically white and historically black institutions, and that Mississippi’s admissions requirements needed to be reviewed, he chose to focus his energies on the ambiguities in the majority’s standard for evaluating the efficacy of a state’s efforts to disestablish de jure segregation. Specifically, he criticized and rejected the majority’s test as ambiguous and unattainable. Although Justice Scalia agreed with Justice Thomas that the standards that applied to evaluating a formerly de jure system in the grade school context did not apply in the higher education context, Justice Scalia questioned what the majority meant by requiring that the state’s prior de jure system must be eliminated to the extent practicable and consistent with educational practices. For Justice Scalia, the former de jure states had only one duty: “to eliminate discriminatory obstacles to admission.” Unlike Justice Thomas, Justice Scalia joined in the majority only in so far as it held that Mississippi failed to meet its burden to show that it had eliminated intentional 246 Id. at 748-49 (Thomas, J., concurring) (quoting Carnegie Commission on Higher Education, From Isolation to Mainstream: Problems of the Colleges Founded for Negroes 11 (1971)) (“The colleges founded for Negroes are both a source of pride to blacks who have attended them and a source of hope to black families who want the benefits of higher learning for their children. They have exercised leadership in developing educational opportunities for young blacks at all levels of instruction, and, especially in the South, they are still regarded as key institutions for enhancing the general quality of the lives of black Americans.”).

247 See id. at 749 (Scalia, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).

248 Id. at 749–55 (Scalia, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).

249 See id. at 750-53 (Scalia, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).

250 Id. at 752–53 (Scalia, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).

251 Fordice, 505 U.S. at 755 (Scalia, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“Establishment of neutral admission standards, not the eradication of all ‘policies traceable to the de jure system . . . having discriminatory effects’ is what Hawkins is about.”) (citations omitted).
discriminatory admission standards. To Justice Scalia, it was the unattainable and vague standards that proved most troublesome,\textsuperscript{252} and not necessarily the continued survival of “a symbol of the highest attainments of black culture.”\textsuperscript{253}

Three years after \textit{Fordice}, Justice Thomas sat on another case, \textit{Missouri v. Jenkins},\textsuperscript{254} which addressed another state’s attempts to remedy previously mandated segregation by law—this time, the State of Missouri. In that case, the State of Missouri challenged the district court’s orders requiring the state to fund salary increases for instructional and non-instructional staff within the Kansas City, Missouri, School District and to continue to fund remedial quality education programs because student achievement levels were still at or below national norms at all grade levels.\textsuperscript{255} The salary increases and the remedial quality education programs were part of a larger, proposed plan to convert the district’s public schools into magnet schools that “would draw non-minority students from private schools who have abandoned or avoided [the school district], and draw in additional non-minority students from the suburbs.”\textsuperscript{256}

In ruling on the State of Missouri’s challenge to the district court’s remedial orders for the school district, the Supreme Court, in an opinion

\begin{flushright}
\textsuperscript{252} Justice Scalia concluded:
What I do predict is a number of years of litigation-driven confusion and destabilization in the university systems of all the formerly de jure States, that will benefit neither blacks nor whites, neither predominantly black institutions nor predominately white ones. Nothing good will come of this judicially ordained turmoil, except the public recognition that any court that would knowingly impose it must hate segregation. We must find some other way of making that point.
\end{flushright}

\textit{Fordice,} 505 U.S. at 762 (Scalia, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).

\begin{flushright}
\textsuperscript{253} Justice Scalia did comment, however, on how the \textit{Fordice} decision could negatively impact historically black colleges and universities. For example, Justice Scalia interpreted the decision as preventing the adoption of any policy to provide equal funding to both black and white institutions because “equal funding, like program duplication, facilitates continued segregation—enabling students to attend schools where their own race predominates without paying a penalty in the quality of their education.”
\end{flushright}

\textit{Fordice,} 505 U.S. at 759 (Scalia, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).

\begin{flushright}
\textsuperscript{254} 515 U.S. 70 (1995).
\textsuperscript{255} See id. at 73.
\textsuperscript{256} \textit{Jenkins,} 515 U.S. at 77.
\end{flushright}
authored by Chief Justice Rehnquist, held that the challenged orders were beyond the remedial authority of the district court. Specifically, in reviewing the authority by which the district could approve salary increases for instructional and non-instructional staff, the Court asserted that a proper analysis of the case would rest on whether the remedy “was necessarily designed . . . to restore the victims of discriminatory conduct to the position they would have occupied in the absence of such conduct.”

The Court then held that the order approving across-the-board salary increases was beyond the scope of the district court because it was grounded in an effort to “improv[e] the desegregative attractiveness” of the school district, rather than to eliminate racially identifiable schools within the district. In addition, the Court determined that the district court’s order requiring the State to continue to fund remedial quality education programs was not an appropriate test for deciding whether the dual school system had achieved partial unitary status because it was grounded in an effort to improve student achievement levels to meet national norms, as opposed to focusing on “whether the reduction in achievement by minority students attributable to prior de jure segregation ha[d] been remedied to the extent practicable.”

Accordingly, the Court remanded the case to the district court to determine if, consistent with the Supreme Court’s opinion, the district court’s supervision should be withdrawn.

As in Fordice, Justice Thomas filed a concurring opinion to emphasize “a few thoughts with respect to the overall course of [the] litigation.” Obviously referring to the district plan to create a magnet school district that would attract white students and suburban students back to the district, Justice Thomas blasted the district court with the black conservative concept that a focus on integration unnecessarily withdraws attention from the quality of education that black children are receiving in schools in their own neighborhoods. He wrote:

\[257\] See id. at 90-93.
\[258\] Id. at 89.
\[259\] Id. at 91–93, 98-100.
\[260\] Id. at 101.
\[261\] See id. at 102.
\[262\] Id. at 114 (Thomas, J., concurring).
It never ceases to amaze me that the courts are so willing to assume that anything that is predominately black must be inferior. Instead of focusing on remedying the harm done to those black schoolchildren injured by segregation, the District Court here sought to convert the Kansas City, Missouri, School District (KCMSD) into a “magnet district” that would reverse the “white flight” caused by desegregation.

For Justice Thomas, he found the very idea of focusing on the creation of a school district that would attract Whites offensive because he believed that that idea rested on the notion that the school would automatically improve or be made better because its white population had returned.

Like his conservative counterparts, Justice Thomas’s main issue was black empowerment, not integration for integration’s sake. As Justice Thomas expressed in his concurrence:

Racial isolation itself is not a harm; only state-enforced segregation is. After all, if separation is a harm, and if integration therefore is the only way that blacks can receive a proper education, then there must be something 263 Id. at 114 (Thomas, J., concurring); see also Brown, supra note 124, at 312–13 (“Justice Thomas criticizes the focus on integration as a route to educational equality and encourages the black community to look within itself: in other words, to exploit resources innovatively that presently exist in the black community.”).

---

264 Id. at 114, 119 (Thomas, J., concurring) (noting that such ideas rest on an assumption of black inferiority).

265 See id. at 121–22 (Thomas, J., concurring) (“Given that desegregation has not produced the predicted leaps forward in black educational achievement, there is no reason to think that black students cannot learn as well when surrounded when surrounded by members of their own race as when they are in an integrated environment.”). Cf. Michael A. Middleton, Brown v. Board: Revisited, 20 S. Ill. U. L.J. 19, 21 (1995) (commenting that the author was bothered by the idea that the problem of addressing “damaging effects of segregation . . . can be corrected by the simple expedient of appropriately mixing Black and White bodies”). But see Jose Felipe Anderson, Perspectives on Missouri v. Jenkins: Abandoning the Unfinished Business of Public School Desegregation “With All Deliberate Speed,” 39 How. L.J. 693, 695 (1996) (arguing that we “must pursue integration even while acknowledging recent failures that have led some to call for the abandonment of techniques designed to integrate public schools”\).
inferior about blacks. Under this theory, segregation injures blacks because blacks, when left on their own, cannot achieve.\textsuperscript{266}

Indeed, Justice Thomas took his argument one step further, again arguing as he did in Fordice, that predominantly black schools (despite their origins in state-enforced segregation) are often well-suited to provide education and direction to young black children for a variety of reasons.\textsuperscript{267} In particular, Thomas explained that, “[b]ecause of their distinctive histories and traditions, black schools can function as the center and symbol of black communities, and provide examples of independent black leadership, success, and achievement.”\textsuperscript{268} In sum, much like his fellow black conservatives, Justice Thomas was pointing to a symbol of African-American history to show Blacks had repeatedly overcome segregation and other similar obstacles to educate themselves. Only this time, as Thomas was contending, the legal obstacle of Jim Crow had been removed.

In fact, Thomas’s concurrence in \textit{Jenkins} has even been used by one author to support an Afrocentric curriculum that “articulates a vision of black culture which meets the intersubjective needs of black youth.”\textsuperscript{269} Much like Thomas and his black conservative cohorts, this author maintained that blacks should turn inward and construct creative remedies to utilize the resources within the community to advance academic achievement among black children.\textsuperscript{270}

\textsuperscript{266} \textit{Jenkins}, 515 U.S. at 122 (Thomas, J., concurring) (emphasis added); see also \textit{Greenya}, supra note 5, at 48 (“Thomas wants to know in every instance what integration means for blacks. If it means losing the alternative of going to their own schools, running their own businesses, then he doesn’t like it. He has too many scars from episodes in which, in the name of integration, he was the only black.”).

\textsuperscript{267} \textit{Jenkins}, 515 U.S. at 121-22 (Thomas, J., concurring) (“[Historically black schools] can be both a source of pride to blacks who have attended them and a source of hope to black families who want the benefits of . . . learning for their children.”).

\textsuperscript{268} \textit{Id.} at 122 (Thomas, J., concurring); see also \textit{Brown}, supra note 124, at 319 (“Essentially, black educators took institutions that were scorned and resource-deprived, and turned them into thriving centers of academic excellence. Moreover, these schools provide benefits that go far beyond the academic enrichment of individual students; often they accrue to the larger black community.”).

\textsuperscript{269} \textit{Brown}, supra note 124, at 314.

\textsuperscript{270} See id.
Indeed, in Zellman v. Simmons-Harris, the case in which the Supreme Court held that a voucher program in Ohio did not violate the Establishment Clause, Justice Thomas himself expressed this concept of “turning inward,” starting with a quote by Frederick Douglass: “Education . . . means emancipation. It means light and liberty. It means the uplifting of the soul of man into the glorious light of truth, the light by which men can only be made free.” In so doing, Thomas highlighted that “failing urban public schools disproportionately affect minority children most in need of educational opportunity.” He also contended that just as Blacks had supported and fought for public education during Reconstruction, they now advocated school choice and voucher programs because it offered them a hope and means to educate properly their children despite struggling and failing communities. In essence, like his black fellow conservatives, he viewed these programs as vital because they gave minority parents a means of placing the reins back in their own hands—to rely on themselves and their choices for their children’s education.

---

273 Id. at 2480 (Thomas, J., concurring). (quoting The Blessings of Liberty and Education: An Address Delivered in Manassas, Virginia, on 3 September 1894, in 5 THE FREDERICK DOUGLASS PAPERS 623 (J. Blassingame & J. McKivigan eds. 1992)).

274 Id. at 2483 (Thomas, J., concurring).

275 Zellman, 122 S. Ct. at 2483 (Thomas, J., concurring) (“At the time of Reconstruction, blacks considered public education ‘a matter of personal liberation and a necessary function of a free society.’ Today, however, the promise of public school education has failed poor inner-city blacks. While in theory providing education to everyone, the quality of public schools varies significantly across districts. Just as blacks supported public education during Reconstruction, many blacks and other minorities now support school choice programs because they provide the greatest educational opportunities for their children in struggling communities.”); see also id. n.7 (Thomas, J., concurring) (“Minority and low-income parents express the greatest support for parental choice and are most interested in placing their children in private schools. ‘[T]he appeal of private schools is especially strong among parents who are low in income, minority, and live in low-performing districts: precisely the parents who are the most disadvantaged under the current system.’”) (citing T. MOE, SCHOOLS, VOUCHERS, AND THE AMERICAN PUBLIC 164 (2001)).
B. Affirmative Action

[Clarence] Thomas’s critics may snigger that he is sitting comfortably in one of the most powerful seats in government, trying to tell everyone else to make it on merit. But this attitude only proves Thomas right.

–Robyn Blumer

Justice Thomas’s stance on opposing affirmative action has received enormous press not only because it seems, to many, to be hostile to black interests but also because it looks as if Justice Thomas is rejecting his personal history. A number of Thomas’s critics condemn him for drawing up the ladder of affirmative action after he has climbed it. In response, Justice Thomas has asserted that his critics’ words only support his views on affirmative action, demonstrating how affirmative action negatively impacts those who have worked hard to achieve on their own by tagging them as beneficiaries of race-based preferences.

277 See Angela Onwuachi-Willig, Using the Master’s Tool to Dismantle His House: Why Justice Clarence Thomas Makes the Case for Affirmative Action, 47 ARIZ. L. REV. (forthcoming 2005) (manuscript at 1-5, on file with author) (describing how many commentators feel that Justice Thomas has pulled up the ladder of affirmative action after climbing it). Justice Thomas denies ever being a beneficiary of affirmative action. In an interview in the late 1980’s, Thomas once asserted, “This thing about how they let me into Yale – that kind of stuff offends me. All they did was stop stopping us.” Williams, A Question of Fairness, supra note 56, at 75. Abraham Goldstein, Dean of Yale Law School from 1970 to 1975, and James Thomas, who was an admissions officer for Yale Law School when Clarence Thomas applied in 1971, assert otherwise. For example, Dean Goldstein stated, He had “no doubt . . . that in some measure Clarence was preferred because of his background.” See Justice Clarence Thomas; A Classic Example of an Affirmative Action Baby, J. BLACKS HIGHER. EDUC., Jan., 31, 1998, at 35.

278 See, e.g., Maureen Dowd, Where Would Thomas Be Without Affirmative Action, SEATTLE POST-INTELLIGENCER, June 26, 2003, at B7 (asserting that Thomas “could not make a powerful legal argument against racial preferences, given the fact that he got into Yale Law School and got picked for the Supreme Court thanks to his race”).

279 See Grutter v. Bollinger, 123 S. Ct. 2325, 2362 (2003) (Thomas, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (affirmative action unfairly stigmatizes Blacks who would have been admitted based on “merit” alone and tars them as “undeserving”).
This alleged negative impact of affirmative action, however, is not the only element of Justice Thomas’s philosophy on that subject. Imbedded in Justice Thomas’s opposition to affirmative action are four other central ideas: (1) that the approval and support of affirmative action by Whites is not void of self-interest, but is merely “window dressing” that is not designed to address true inequalities; (2) that affirmative action is actually harmful to Blacks because it causes low self-esteem among Blacks; (3) that affirmative action is harmful because it does not actually foster equality for Blacks, but instead reinforces a self-defeating sense of victimization; and (4) that affirmative action fails to assist the vast majority of poor black people, instead mostly assisting the black middle class and upper middle class.

Thus, unlike white conservative ideology, which posits that affirmative action is unfair because it results in “reverse” discrimination against Whites, Justice Thomas’s philosophy and jurisprudence on affirmative action concentrates on what he views as its poisonous impact on the lives and psyche of Black people.

The first affirmative action case from Justice Thomas’s tenure on the Supreme Court was Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Pena. In that case, the Supreme Court reviewed whether the government’s practice of giving general contractors on government projects the financial incentive of additional compensation to hire subcontractors certified as small businesses controlled by “socially and economically disadvantaged 280 See generally Grutter, 123 S. Ct. at 2350-62; see also Williams, Fairness, supra note 56, at 74; cf. Seth N. Asumah & Valencia Perkins, Black Conservatism and the Social Problems in Black America, J. BLACK STUDIES, at 64 (2000) (noting that “Black conservatives add a self-esteem portion to their position [on affirmative action], claiming that affirmative action destroys the self-image of Black people” and that Black conservatives “believe the pride of achievement is diluted because many Whites maintain that beneficiaries of affirmative action receive jobs, promotions, and school admissions without being qualified”); "); STEPHEN CARTER, REFLECTIONS OF AN AFFIRMATIVE ACTION BABY (1992) (“The best black syndrome creates in those of us who have benefited from racial preferences a peculiar contradiction. We are told over and over that we were the best black people in our profession. And we are flattered. . . . But to professionals who have worked hard to succeed, flattery of this kind carries an unstable insult, for we yearn to be called what our achievements often deserve: simply the best-no qualifiers needed.”). Stephen Carter does not identify as a black conservative. See id. at 7 (“[M]y views on many matters are sufficiently to the left that I do not imagine the conservative movement would want me.”).

---

individuals” violated the equal protection component of the Fifth Amendment’s Due Process Clause.\textsuperscript{282} The majority, with whom Thomas concurred, held that all racial classifications imposed by a federal, state, or local governmental actor, whether benign or not, must be analyzed by a reviewing court under strict scrutiny, meaning that all racial classifications imposed by a governmental actor have to serve a compelling governmental interest and must be narrowly tailored to further that interest.\textsuperscript{283}

Justice Scalia filed an opinion that concurred in part and concurred in the judgment of the majority’s opinion.\textsuperscript{284} He wrote that the “government can never have a ‘compelling interest’ in discriminating on the basis of race in order to ‘make up’ for past racial discrimination in the opposite direction.”\textsuperscript{285} Justice Scalia stressed that such a concept was foreign to the Constitution, which focuses on the individual.\textsuperscript{286}

In writing his concurring opinion, Justice Thomas gave just a small taste of how his jurisprudence on affirmative action aligns with black conservative thought and differs from Justice Scalia’s.\textsuperscript{287} Like many of his fellow black conservatives, Justice Thomas did not focus on the harm that affirmative action causes to “innocent” white individuals, but instead expressed his views regarding what he deemed to be affirmative action’s harmful impact on minorities. First, he noted his belief that there was a racial paternalism underlying the dissent’s view that distinctions could be made under the constitution “between laws designed to subjugate a race and those that distribute benefits on the basis of race.”\textsuperscript{288} Then, he iterated his belief that affirmative action could be nothing other than harmful to Blacks and other minorities, stating that “there can be no doubt that racial paternalism and its unintended \textsuperscript{282} Adarand, 515 U.S. at 205. “Socially and economically disadvantaged individuals” included “Black Americans, Hispanic Americans, Native Americans, Asian Pacific Americans, and other minorities, or any other individual found to be disadvantaged by the [Small Business] Administration pursuant to section 8(a) of the Small Business Act.” Id. at 205 (citing 15 U.S.C. §§637(d)(2), (3)).

\textsuperscript{283} Id. at 227-30 (Scalia, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment).

\textsuperscript{284} See id. at 227 (Scalia, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment).

\textsuperscript{285} Id. at 227-30 (Scalia, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment) (citing Richmond v. J.A. Croson Co., 488 U.S. 469, 520 (1989)).

\textsuperscript{286} See id. (Scalia, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment).

\textsuperscript{287} See supra note 31 and accompanying text.

\textsuperscript{288} Adarand, 515 U.S. at 240 (Thomas, J., concurring).
consequences can be as poisonous and pernicious as any other form of discrimination."\textsuperscript{289} Finally, Justice Thomas moved on to identify what he believes to be the stigmatizing effects of the program on minorities, stating:

So-called “benign” discrimination teaches many [Whites] that because of chronic and apparently immutable handicaps, minorities cannot compete with them without their patronizing indulgence. Inevitably such programs engender attitudes of superiority, or alternatively, provoke resentment among those who believe that they have been wronged by the government’s use of race. [T]he programs stamp minorities with a badge of inferiority and may cause them to develop dependencies or to adopt an attitude that they are ‘entitled’ to preferences.\textsuperscript{290}

It would be nearly ten years before Justice Thomas would receive another occasion to incorporate core principles of black conservative thought into his jurisprudence on affirmative action. That time would come with the Supreme Court’s grant of certiorari on two cases from the Sixth Circuit concerning affirmative action at the University of Michigan, one in the undergraduate program for Literature, Science, and Arts program and the other in the law school.

The cases, \textit{Gratz v. Bollinger}\textsuperscript{291} and \textit{Grutter v. Bollinger}\textsuperscript{292} ended a debate over the legality of affirmative action that had transpired since \textit{Regents of the University of California v. Bakke}\textsuperscript{293} the Supreme Court’s \textsuperscript{289} \textit{Id.} at 241 (Thomas, J., concurring); see also 515 U.S. at 240 (Thomas, J., concurring) (emphasis added) (stating that “there is a moral and constitutional equivalence between laws designed to subjugate race and those that distribute benefits on the basis of race in order to foster some current notion of equality” and that \textit{g}overnment \textit{cannot make us equal}; \textit{it can only recognize, respect, and protect us as equal before the law”}).

\textsuperscript{290} \textit{Id.} at 241 (Thomas, J., concurring) (emphasis added). \textit{Cf.} \textit{Watts, supra} note 67, at 206 (asserting that race-based solutions “feed on the notion that membership in a certain race is a handicap, a sure cause of underperformance”).

\textsuperscript{291} 123 S. Ct. 2411 (2003).

\textsuperscript{292} 123 S. Ct. 2325 (2003).

\textsuperscript{293} 438 U.S. 265 (1978). In \textit{Bakke}, the Supreme Court reviewed a racial set-aside program that reserved 16 out of 100 seats in a medical school class for members of decision on the affirmative action program at the University of California-Davis Medical School in 1977.\footnote{Kevin R. Johnson, The Last Twenty Five Years of Affirmative Action?, CONST. COMM. (forthcoming 2004) (manuscript at 1-2, on file with author) (“The latest pair of cases announced a truce of sorts in affirmative action hostilities.”).} In \textit{Gratz}, two white students who applied for and were denied admission to the University of Michigan’s College of Literature, Science, and Arts as residents of Michigan filed a lawsuit, claiming that the university’s use of racial preferences in undergraduate admissions violated their rights under the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.\footnote{\textit{Gratz}, 123 S. Ct. at 2417.} In reviewing the case, the Supreme Court, in a 6-3 decision, concluded that the college’s admissions policy, which automatically distributed twenty points to every single underrepresented minority applicant solely because of race, was not narrowly tailored to achieve the interest in racial diversity that was claimed to justify its program and therefore was unconstitutional.\footnote{\textit{Id.} at 2427–28.} Justice Thomas joined the majority and wrote a concurrence that was void of any explicitly “raced” thought.\footnote{\textit{Id.} at 2433 (Thomas, J., concurring) (noting only one further observation, which was that the college’s policy did not suffer from the constitutional defect of distinctions among underrepresented minority applicants because it did not a racial preference to members of some underrepresented minority groups).}

His dissent in the second opinion \textit{Grutter}, however, was different. It was bursting with many core ideas of black conservative ideology. In \textit{Grutter}, Barbara Grutter, a white resident of the State of Michigan who had applied for and was denied admission to the University of Michigan Law School, filed a lawsuit, alleging like the plaintiffs in \textit{Gratz}, that the law school had violated her constitutional rights under the Fourteenth Amendment.\footnote{\textit{Grutter}, 123 S. Ct. at 2332–33.} Specifically, she alleged that “her application was rejected because the Law School uses race as a ‘predominant’ factor, giving applicants who belong to certain minority groups ‘a significantly greater chance of admission than students with similar credentials from disfavored racial groups.’”\footnote{\textit{Id.} at 2333 (quoting Appendix 33–34).} She further argued that the law school had no compelling interest for such use of race.\textsuperscript{300}

In describing its admissions process, the law school provided evidence to show that, while it maintained records on the racial and ethnic composition of the class, it never required the admission of a certain percentage of minority law students.\textsuperscript{301} Instead, it individually reviewed each application with race as a plus factor.\textsuperscript{302} Furthermore, the law school showed that it worked only to ensure a “critical mass” of underrepresented minority students at the school “such that underrepresented minority students do not feel isolated or like spokespersons for their race” and such that classroom discussion and the educational experience outside of the classroom could be enhanced by diverse backgrounds and perspectives.\textsuperscript{303} The law school also presented evidence that demonstrated that the elimination of its current admissions policies would have an extremely negative impact on the number of minorities admitted to the law school.\textsuperscript{304}

In \textit{Grutter}, in a 5–4 decision authored by Justice O’Connor, the Court held that the law school has a compelling state interest in attaining a diverse student body\textsuperscript{305} and that the law school’s use of race in its admissions process was narrowly tailored to further that compelling interest of diversity and the educational benefits that flow from having a diverse student body, such as cross-racial understanding, the tearing down of stereotypes, and the preparation of students for working in an increasingly diverse workforce.\textsuperscript{306} In holding that the law school had a compelling state interest in diversity, the Supreme Court asserted that it deferred to the law school’s judgment that diversity was essential to its educational mission and concluded that “‘good faith’ on the part of a university is ‘presumed’ absent ‘a showing to the contrary.’”\textsuperscript{307} In determining that the law school’s admissions policies were narrowly tailored to that interest, the Court declared that the law school’s policies ensured a highly individualized review of each applicant and gave serious consideration to the myriad of ways that an applicant could contribute to

\begin{footnotesize}
\begin{itemize}
\item\textsuperscript{300} See id.
\item\textsuperscript{301} See id. at 2333.
\item\textsuperscript{302} Id. at 2333-34.
\item\textsuperscript{303} Id.
\item\textsuperscript{304} Id. at 2334.
\item\textsuperscript{305} Id. at 2339.
\item\textsuperscript{306} Id. at 2338–42
\item\textsuperscript{307} \textit{Grutter}, 123 S. Ct. at 2339.
\end{itemize}
\end{footnotesize}
the diversity of the school in that review.\textsuperscript{308} Finally, the Court rejected the suggestion that the law school simply lower its admissions standards, stating that such remedy would make the law school a very different institution and would force the law school to sacrifice an essential component of its educational mission.\textsuperscript{309}

In response to the majority opinion, Justice Thomas wrote an equally long dissent that was rooted in black conservative ideology on affirmative action.\textsuperscript{310} Indeed, Justice Thomas began his dissent with a quote from Frederick Douglass, a former slave and an abolitionist, in a speech in 1865.\textsuperscript{311} Emphasizing the black conservative principle of self-reliance and black empowerment, Thomas began his dissent as follows: “Like Douglass, I believe blacks can achieve in every avenue of American \textsuperscript{308} \textit{Grutter}, 123 S. Ct. at 2343.

\textsuperscript{309} \textit{Grutter}, 123 S. Ct. at 2345 (Thomas, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part). The Court also set a “time limit” on the use of race-conscious policies, noting that it expects “that 25 years from now, the use of racial preferences will no longer be necessary to further the interest approved today.” \textit{Id.} at 2347. \textit{See generally} Kevin R. Johnson, supra note 294 (exploring the meaning of the 25-year time limit, the Court’s authority to set such a time limit, and the practicality of such a time limit).

\textsuperscript{310} \textit{See} Cass Sunstein, \textit{Affirmative Action in Higher Education: Why Grutter Was Correctly Decided}, J. BLACK HIGHER EDUC., Oct. 31, 2003 (asserting that Justice Thomas abandoned his commitment to originalism and called “for an extraordinary exercise in judicial activism” in \textit{Grutter} in light of the fact that “[a] great deal of historical work suggest that affirmative action was accepted by those who ratified the equal protection clause”).

\textsuperscript{311} \textit{Grutter}, 123 S.Ct. at 2350 (Thomas, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part). The quote was as follows:

[I]n regard to the colored people, there is always more that is benevolent, I perceive, than just, manifested towards us. What I ask for the negro is not benevolence, not pity, not sympathy, but simply justice. The American people have always been anxious to know what they shall do with us .... I have had but one answer from the beginning. Do nothing with us! Your doing with us has already played the mischief with us. Do nothing with us! If the apples will not remain on the tree of their own strength, if they are worm-eaten at the core, if they are early ripe and disposed to fall, let them fall! ... And if the negro cannot stand on his own legs, let him fall also. All I ask is, give him a chance to stand on his own legs! Let him alone! ... [Y]our interference is doing him positive injury.

\textit{Id.} (quoting \textit{What the Black Man Wants: An Address Delivered in Boston, Massachusetts}, on 26 January 1865, reprinted in \textit{4 THE FREDERICK DOUGLASS PAPERS} 59, 68 (J. Blassingame & J. McKivigan eds.1991)).
life without the meddling of university administrators.” Then, as many other black conservatives have argued, Justice Thomas maintained that the use of the affirmative action only impairs minority students and that only self-sufficiency can remedy the disparities that encourage the use of race-conscious admissions. To Justice Thomas, the law school had taken the easy way out of resolving the educational inequalities between Whites and the underrepresented minorities that were the targets of its program. Then, much like he did in Fordice and Jenkins, Justice Thomas inquired whether the educational advancement of black students was superior in more homogenous schools, noting that there is “growing evidence that racial . . . heterogeneity actually impairs learning among black students” and citing studies that found that black students who attended historically black colleges reported higher academic achievement than those who attended predominantly white colleges. In fact, citing Thomas Sowell, a well-known black conservative and a mentor of his, Justice Thomas maintained in his dissent that race-conscious admissions policies like that used by the law school harm, rather than help, minority students because they allow insufficiently prepared students to study in elite institutions where they will fail. Moreover, like black conservatives such as Shelby Steele and John McWhorter advise, Justice Thomas argued that current race-conscious admissions policies only “help to fulfill the bigot’s prophecy about black underperformance” by creating an incentive for Blacks to embrace black victimology. Specifically, he maintained that “there is no incentive for the black applicant to continue to prepare for the LSAT once he is reasonably assured of achieving the requisite score.”

---

312 Grutter, 123 S. Ct. at 2350 (Thomas, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).
313 See id. at 2362-63 (Thomas, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).
314 Id. at 2358 (Thomas, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (citing Flowers & Pascarella, Cognitive Effects of College Racial Composition on African American Students After 3 Years of College, 40 J. OF C. STUDENT DEV. 669, 674 (1999) and Allen, The Color of Success: African-American College Student Outcomes at Predominantly White and Historically Black Public Colleges and Universities, 62 HARV. EDUC. REV. 26, 35 (1992)).
315 Grutter, 123 S. Ct. at 2362 (Thomas, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (citing THOMAS SOWELL, RACE AND CULTURE 176–77 (1994)).
316 Id. at 2365 (Thomas, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).
317 Id. at 2365 (Thomas, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part); see also id. n.16 (Thomas, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“I use the LSAT as an example, but the same incentive structure is in place for any admissions criteria, meaning the score above which nearly all Blacks were guaranteed admission. On the other hand, for Whites, those who “aspir[e] to admission at the Law School have every incentive to improve their score to levels above that range.”\textsuperscript{318} In sum, Justice Thomas asked, as do other black conservatives, what is the benefit of diversity to Blacks, thereby suggesting that the “real” benefit of diversity as constructed in current affirmative action programs was for Whites only.\textsuperscript{319}

Additionally, throughout his dissent, Thomas, like other black conservatives, repeatedly questioned the true interests and motives of the law school (the Whites who control the university), arguing that the law school’s interest was purely “aesthetic”—with the law school solely desiring a “certain appearance, from the shape of the desks and tables in its classrooms to the color of the students sitting in them.”\textsuperscript{320} Consistent with this distrust of white interests in black conservative ideology, Justice Thomas then openly wondered why, if the law school so valued diversity, it refused to lower its admissions standards, despite the fact that it would change the nature and status of the law school.\textsuperscript{321} Justice Thomas wrote that the law school’s “reluctance to do [so] suggests that the educational benefits [from diversity] it alleges are not so significant.”\textsuperscript{322} Continuing with his suspicion of the law school’s real interest, Justice Thomas turned to the law school use of the Law School Admissions Test (“LSAT”) in its admissions procedures. He wrote that:

including undergraduate grades, on which minorities are consistently admitted at thresholds significantly lower than whites.”\textsuperscript{318}

\textsuperscript{318} \textit{Id.} at 2364 (Thomas, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).

\textsuperscript{319} See, e.g., STEELE, A DREAM DEFERRED, note 24, at 136 (“A law professor says, ‘I want blacks in my classroom when I teach constitutional law. The diversity of opinion helps us better understand the Constitution.’ But are blacks human beings or teaching tools? Is it good for human beings to be made to play this role, to be brought in, often in defiance of standards, because their color is presumed to carry a point of view that diversifies classroom content?’”).

\textsuperscript{320} \textit{Grutter}, 123 S. Ct. at 2352 n.3 (Thomas, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).

\textsuperscript{321} See \textit{id.} at 2353 n.4 (Thomas, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).

\textsuperscript{322} \textit{id.} at 2353 n.4 (Thomas, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“In other words, the Law School seeks to improve marginally the education it offers without sacrificing too much of its exclusivity and elite status.”); see also \textit{id.} at 2356 (“With the adoption of different admissions methods, such as accepting all students who meet minimum qualifications, the Law School could achieve its vision of the racially aesthetic student body without the use of racial discrimination.”) (citation omitted).
no modern law school can claim ignorance of the poor performance of blacks, relatively speaking, on the . . . LSAT. . . . Nevertheless, law schools continue to use the test and then attempt to ‘correct’ for black underperformance by using racial discrimination in admissions so as to obtain their aesthetic student body.\footnote{323}

This, Justice Thomas suggested, simply showed that the law school was merely interested in window dressing, and not the actual advancement of black students.\footnote{324} In his eyes, the law school only cares if its “class looks right, even if it does not perform right.”\footnote{325} As his fellow black conservatives have often expressed, Justice Thomas finally implied that persons who govern schools such as the University of Michigan Law School were only advocating for minorities what they would not advocate for their own children. He asserted that “aestheticians will never address the real problems facing ‘underrepresented minorities,’ instead continuing their social experiments on other people’s children.”\footnote{326}

Lastly, Justice Thomas incessantly referred to what he and other

\footnote{\textit{Id.} at 2360 (Thomas, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).}

\footnote{\textit{Id.} at 2362-65 (Thomas, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).}

\footnote{\textit{Id.} at 2362 (Thomas, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).}

\footnote{\textit{Id.} at 2362 (Thomas, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).}

To support this argument, Justice Thomas proposes the following:

For example, there is no recognition by the Law School in this case that even with their racial discrimination in place, black men are “underrepresented” at the Law School. Why does the Law School not also discriminate in favor of black men over black women, given this underrepresentation? The answer is, again, that all the Law School cares about is its own image among know-it-all elites, not solving real problems like the crisis of black male underperformance.

black conservatives regard as the demoralizing effect of affirmative action on minorities. Again, as in Adarand, Justice Thomas contended that affirmative action unfairly stigmatizes Blacks who would have been admitted based on “merit” alone and tars them as “undeserving.” In the end, he asked, “Who can differentiate between those who belong and those who do not”—a question that has repeatedly been asked about Thomas throughout his career and, which given his life experiences at Yale Law School and in his career, obviously drives in part his views on affirmative action.328

C. Crime

Look at these young brothers dying in the street—the drive-by shootings, the violence. If dogs were being struck down at the same rate and in the same way, and left bleeding in the gutter, there would be a society of blue-haired women to save our canine friends. But these are young black men bleeding in the gutter, and no one seems to give a damn.

–Clarence Thomas329

327 Id. at 2362 (Thomas, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“Beyond the harm the Law School’s racial discrimination visits upon its test subjects, no social science has disproved the notion that this discrimination ‘engender[s] attitudes of superiority or, alternatively, provoke[s] resentment among those who believe that they have been wronged by the government’s use of race.’”); id. (Thomas, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (quoting Adarand, 515 U.S. 204, 241 (1995) (Thomas, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment)); id. (“Who can differentiate between those who belong and those who do not? The majority of blacks are admitted to the Law School because of discrimination, and because of this policy all are tarred as undeserving. This problem of stigma does not depend on determinacy as to whether those stigmatized are actually the ‘beneficiaries’ of racial discrimination. When blacks take positions in the highest places of government, industry, or academia, it is an open question today whether their skin color played a part in their advancement. The question itself is the stigma—because either racial discrimination did play a role, in which case the person may be deemed ‘otherwise unqualified,’ or it did not, in which case asking the question itself unfairly marks those blacks who would succeed without discrimination.”).

328 See Williams, supra note 56, at 74.

329 Quoted in Jeffrey Rosen, supra note 202, at 67; see also Thomas, supra note 30, at 13 (“We should be at least as incensed about the totalitarianism of drug traffickers and criminals in poor neighborhoods as we were about totalitarianism in Eastern bloc countries”).
In the area of criminal law, Justice Thomas has earned a reputation as a hard and unforgiving Justice, with many wondering what he meant when testified before the Senate that he would often watch busloads of prisoners from his window and say to himself, “[T]here but by the Grace of God, go I.” To many, nothing about his criminal jurisprudence reflects any empathy for criminals. As noted above, however, a core principle of black conservative thought on crime is its advocacy for the severe punishment of criminals and the protection of victims, especially poor black victims whom black conservatives view as being prisoners in their own homes due to the rapidly deteriorating conditions of their streets and neighborhoods.

Although Justice Thomas has been provided with little opportunity 330 See, e.g., Calmore, supra note 21, at 208; Note, Lasting Stigma, supra note 21, at 1331 (“Thomas concluded that his story of professional success in the face of significant obstacles would enable him ‘to stand in the shoes of . . . people across a broad spectrum’ of American society. He spoke of the view from his office, which allowed him to see the busloads of criminal defendants being brought to the courthouse: ‘And you look out, and you say to yourself, and I say to myself almost every day, But for the grace of God there go I.’ Yet in his first Term on the Supreme Court, Justice Thomas issued a dissent in Hudson v. McMillian in which he argued that an inmate’s beating by two prison guards, a beating that bruised the inmate’s face, loosened his teeth, and cracked his dental plate, did not fall within the Eighth Amendment’s stricture against cruel and unusual punishments. The dissent sparked scathing criticism and prompted one editorial to label Justice Thomas the ‘[y]oungest, [c]ruellest Justice.’”); Eric. L. Muller, Where, But For The Grace of God, Goes He? The Search For Empathy in the Criminal Jurisprudence of Clarence Thomas, 15 CONST. COMM. 225, 225–26 (1998) (“Once Judge Thomas became Justice Thomas, this compassionate image tarnished quickly. Empathy was difficult to discern in his dissent in Hudson v. McMillan, one of his very early opinions.”); Smith, supra note 95, at 26 (noting that “[o]ne searches in vain, however, for clear evidence in Thomas’s opinions that he has brought his empathic understanding of social reality to the Supreme Court”).

---

When asked at his Senate Confirmation Hearings whether victims should play a greater role in the criminal justice system, Justice Thomas responded:

My concern would be . . . that we don’t jeopardize the rights of the victim. Of course, we would like to make sure that the victims are involved in the process, but we should be very careful, in my view, that we don’t somehow undermine the validity of the process; that an individual who is a criminal defendant is in some way harmed by that.”

Hearings, supra note 160, at 133 (testimony of Clarence Thomas) (emphasis added).

331 See supra Part I(B)(4).
to present these exact principles in his jurisprudence, he did express these very concepts in Chicago v. Morales.[^332] In Morales, at issue was a Chicago ordinance that required any police officer to issue an order to disperse to any person whom he or she reasonably believed to be a criminal street gang member loitering in any public place with one or more persons.[^333] The ordinance had been criticized by many as giving the police a free license to target and harass young men of color for simply standing on the corner.[^334] In reviewing the claim that this ordinance violated the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, the Supreme Court struck down the ordinance on the ground that it was unconstitutionally vague in failing to establish minimal guidelines for enforcement.[^335]

Not surprisingly, Justice Thomas dissented from the majority, in a writing that was replete with black conservatism. Indeed, as in many of his other opinions, he echoed many of the principles that have been expressed by black conservatives, such as Thomas Sowell, asserting that “gangs fill the daily lives of many of our poorest and most vulnerable citizens with a terror that the Court does not give sufficient consideration, often relegating them to the status of prisoners in their own homes.”[^336] Throughout his dissent, Justice Thomas articulated the black conservative principle on criminal law that promotes a focus on the victim as opposed to the criminal perpetrator.[^337] He also emphasized the “politics of distinction,” noting how the majority sacrificed good, law-abiding citizens who made up the vast majority of the community, for the sake of protecting the “imagined rights” of a few lawbreakers.[^338] He argued:

[^333]: See id. at 45-46.
[^334]: Tony Mauro, Decade After Confirmation, Thomas Becoming a Force on High Court, Fulton Cty. Daily Report, Aug. 20, 2001, at 1 (stating that ordinance was viewed as a tool for police to target Blacks).
[^335]: Morales, 527 U.S. at 60-64 (“It applies to everyone in the city who may remain in one place with one suspected gang member as long as their purpose is not apparent to an officer observing them. Friends, relatives, teachers, counselors, or even total strangers might unwittingly engage in forbidden loitering if they happen to engage in idle conversation with a gang member.”)
[^336]: Id. at 99 (Thomas, J., dissenting).
[^337]: See Mauro, supra 334, at 1 (referring to a comment that Thomas “is eloquently on the side of low-income, law-abiding citizens, not on the side of the criminals”).
[^338]: Morales, 527 U.S. at 115 (Thomas, J., dissenting).
As one resident described: “There is only about one or two percent of the people in the city causing the problems maybe, but it’s keeping ninety eight percent of us in our houses and off the streets and afraid to shop.” By focusing exclusively on the imagined rights of two percent, the Court has denied our most vulnerable citizens the very thing that Justice Stevens elevates above all else—freedom of movement.” 339

Additionally, Justice Thomas expressed black conservatives’ distrust of Whites, specifically hinting that the majority had only furthered the victimization of this society’s most vulnerable citizens (whom black conservatives consistently argue are poor Blacks) and that those in the majority made a decision for these citizens that it would not make for their own communities. 340 He wrote:

Today the Court focuses extensively on the “rights” of gang members and their companions. It can safely do so-- people who will have to live with the consequences do not live in our neighborhoods. Rather, people who will suffer from our lofty pronouncements are people like Ms. Susan Mary Jackson; people who have seen their neighborhoods literally destroyed by gangs and violence and drugs. They are good, decent people who must struggle to overcome their desperate situation, against all odds, in order to raise their families, earn a living and remain good citizens. 341

339 Id. (Thomas, J., dissenting); see also Sowell, supra note 136 (arguing that “Justice Kennedy [who criticized merciless prison sentences] may feel ‘secure’ where he lives and works . . . [b]ut the ‘equal protection of the laws’ under the 14th Amendment applies also to those who live in less elite circumstances”) (emphasis added); cf. GREENYA, supra note 5, at 27 (quoting Thomas as saying “I don’t understand why those of us who say we are so passionate about little kids can’t see that they can’t grow up in these environments” – environments where they are assaulted when they go to school or are in fear for their lives).

340 Morales, 527 U.S. at 115 (Thomas, J., dissenting).

341 Morales, 527 U.S. at 115 (Thomas, J., dissenting).
In fact, in his dissent, Thomas gave voice to the many concerned, law-abiding citizens for whom he argued the ordinance protected. He quoted several of the citizens who supported the ordinance, such as eighty-eight year old Susan Mary Jackson, who testified to the following before the Chicago City Council on the problems of gang loitering:

We used to have a nice neighborhood. We don’t have it anymore . . . . I am scared to go out in the daytime. . . . You can’t pass because they are standing. I am afraid to go to the store. I don’t go to the store because I am afraid. At my age if they look at me real hard, I be ready to holler.

For Justice Thomas, the victims’ right to demand a safe neighborhood deserved equal, if not more, weight than the “imagined” rights of persons who break the law by refusing a policeman’s orders to disperse.

Additionally, Justice Thomas has incorporated black conservative principles regarding the need to eliminate discretion among jurors in his jurisprudence on capital cases. For example, in Graham v. Collins, the Supreme Court rejected the petitioner’s claim that the three special issues the sentencing jury was required to answer prevented the jury from considering mitigating evidence of his youth, unstable family background, and positive character traits on the ground that such a holding would require the announcement of a new rule in violation of the principles of another case. There, Justice Thomas filed a concurring opinion, in which he took advantage of the opportunity to address concerns left by Furman v. Georgia. Noting that “[t]he unquestionable importance of race in Furman is reflected in the fact that three of the original four petitioners in the Furman cases were represented by the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund, Inc.,” Justice Thomas highlighted the dangers of leaving sentencing up to irrational juror considerations, such as

---

342 Id. at 101 (Thomas, J., dissenting).
343 See id. at 115 (Thomas, J., dissenting).
345 See id. at 467-68.
346 408 U.S. 238 (1972).
347 Id. at 481 (Thomas, J., concurring).
class or race animus. He then proclaimed, “One would think . . . that by eliminating explicit jury discretion and treating all defendants equally, a mandatory death penalty scheme was a perfectly reasonable legislative response to the concerns expressed in Furman [v. Georgia].” In so doing, he brought to light the black conservative principle that defendants are only protected against discriminatory sentencing in capital cases if no discretion is left with the jury. In sum, as Justice Thomas had done in cases concerning education and desegregation and affirmative action, Justice Thomas has expressed core principles of black conservative thought in his opinions. Based on what he has written over the last thirteen years as a Supreme Court Justice, Thomas is likely to continue to write and develop a “raced” jurisprudence on certain issues.

IV. CONCLUSION

348 See id. at 481-85 (Thomas, J., concurring).
349 Id. at 487 (Thomas, J., concurring). Justice Thomas supports mandatory death sentences because he believes they will help to eliminate racial prejudices and capriciousness in capital sentencing. See Smith, supra note 95, at 19 (citing Paul M. Barrett, On The Right: Thomas Is Emerging as Strong Conservative Out to Prove Himself, WALL ST. J., Apr. 26, 1993, at A1).
350 Somewhat consistent with these views is Justice Thomas’s positions in cases involving egregious prosecutorial misconduct. For example, in United States v. Williams, 504 U.S. 36 (1992), Justice Thomas split with Justice Scalia, who wrote a majority opinion holding that a district court may not dismiss an otherwise valid indictment on the ground that the government failed to disclose substantial exculpatory evidence to the grand jury. Instead, Justice Thomas joined with Justice Stevens in his dissent, who argued that if a prosecutor withheld evidence that would plainly preclude a finding of probable cause, a district court should be able to dismiss the indictment. Id. at 68-70 (Stevens, J., dissenting). Likewise, in Michaels v. McGrath, 531 U.S. 1118, 121 S. Ct. 873 (2001), the Supreme Court denied a petition for a writ of certiorari, from a case in which the Third Circuit had held that recovery of damages was barred for a wrongfully convicted defendant where child witnesses had been improperly coerced by the prosecution and the defendant’s due process rights were violated by the use of such testimony at trial. See id. at 873. In that case, Justice Thomas wrote a dissent in a denial of a petition for writ of certiorari, explaining his opinion that the Third Circuit’s view and Court’s failure to hear the case left “left victims of egregious prosecutorial misconduct without a remedy.” Id. at 874; see also Margaret Johns, Reconsidering Absolute Prosecutorial Immunity (manuscript on file with author) (arguing that absolute prosecutorial immunity denies civil remedies to innocent people who have been wrongfully convicted of crimes as a result of prosecutorial misconduct).
What does Justice Clarence Thomas’s life and jurisprudence teach us about race and the impact of racial identity? The lessons are many.

First, Justice Thomas’s story tells us that race is an inescapable part of a person’s identity, whether one is conservative or liberal or a racial minority or non-minority. \(^{351}\) Moreover, it demonstrates to us that race impacts and manifests itself in one’s identity in different ways, depending on that individual’s personal biography and perceptions of reality. \(^{352}\) For example, what is evident in Justice Thomas’s life and work is that he, like many of his black counterparts, is conservative precisely because he is black. Much like black liberals whose life experiences have shaped their reactions to issues such as affirmative action in a way that makes them liberal, \(^{353}\) Justice Thomas’s experiences with race have led him to adopt ideologies that are strictly based on self-reliance without government interference in a way that makes him conservative. In fact, much of Justice Thomas’s beliefs and ideologies are rooted in the philosophies of his grandfather Myers Anderson, who raised him. \(^{354}\) It was Anderson, who, although polite, “never, ever trusted” Whites or buckra; \(^{355}\) taught Thomas “that government, like many other things in the segregated South, was for whites only;” \(^{356}\) and instilled in Thomas that he \(^{352}\) See Angela P. Harris, Foreword: The Unbearable Lightness of Identity, 11 Berkeley Women’s L.J. 207, 210 (1996) (asserting that “identity is a complex interplay between what [one] chooses[s] and what is forced upon” him or her); Angela P. Harris, Foreword: The Jurisprudence of Reconstruction, 82 Cal. L. Rev. 741, 774 (1994) (“‘Race’ is real, and pervasive: our very perceptions of the world, some theorists argue, are filtered through a screen of ‘race.’”); see also Smith, supra note 7, at 18 (analyzing how Justice Thomas “incorporates his own views of social reality” into cases).

\(^{353}\) See Deborah C. Malamud, Values, Symbols, and Facts in the Affirmative Action Debate, 95 Mich. L. Rev. 1668, 1713 (1997) (arguing, for example, that “affirmative action has become to the African-American community what abortion rights have become for the feminist community—the constitutive issue, the program because of which we find ourselves a part of the debate rather than disempowered outsiders”).

\(^{354}\) See supra Part II.

\(^{355}\) Foskett, supra note 179, at 63 (noting how Anderson discussed Whites in “coded language his slave ancestors used to describe their owners,” such as “buckra, a West African word for ‘demon’”).

\(^{356}\) Foskett, supra note 179, at 63.
“could not depend on white people for help.” 357 Even though some of Thomas’s experiences, unlike his grandfather’s, led him to accept that some whites could be helpful and encouraging, such as the white nuns who taught Thomas in Catholic school, 358 central to Justice Thomas’s views about the route to racial equality is his belief that black people can and should depend only upon themselves in part because the government itself is often the tool used to create two separate, but unequal worlds for groups. As the Justice once declared, “I lived under two sets of books. . . . I’m not going back to two sets of books again.” 359 Indeed, a critical component of black conservatism itself is the notion that Blacks should not support programs such as affirmative action or policies that provide leniency for criminal defendants because they fail truly to address the problems of the black community and serve only the purpose of assuaging the guilty consciences of white liberals. 360 In other words, black conservatives’ support of colorblindness rests—oddly enough—entirely on their blackness, or more specifically, their belief that their blackness is the very reason they cannot rely on social welfare, government assistance, or benign policies such as affirmative action.

On that same note, Justice Thomas’s life and jurisprudence reveals exactly how devastating racism can be and how an individual’s thoughts, beliefs, and even jurisprudence, regardless of claims of colorblindness and neutrality, are shaped by experiences with race and racism, both subtle and obvious, 361 or, in the case of persons with white-skin privilege, either their lack of experience with racism or their relationships with people who 357 FOSKETT, supra note 179, at 64 (“No white bank lent Anderson the money he needed to start his business or build his own home.”).

358 FOSKETT, supra note 179, at 66 (describing how the nuns at Thomas’s Catholic school made their students, all of whom were black, feel differently about Whites).
359 Quoted in FOSKETT, supra note 179, at 72 (quotations omitted).
360 See Tushnet, Black Nationalism, supra note 243, at 330 (describing how Justice Thomas’s views on education “are infused with scorn for policies supported by elites that assuage their consciences by seeming to address . . . problems [plaguing the black community] without doing so and that allow elites to maintain essentially undisturbed institutions with which they are familiar and from which they benefit”).
361 See Kimberle Williams Crenshaw, Foreword: Toward a Race-Conscious Pedagogy in Legal Education, 4 S. CAL. REV. L. & WOMEN’S STUD. 33, 35 n.4 (1994) (noting that “Blacks are likely to be somewhat aware that law has played a role in maintaining racial privilege” and that “Whites, although aware that racial subordination is a problem, are unlikely to view racism as a constant or central feature of American life”).
are deeply affected by it.\textsuperscript{362} Regardless of how one describes Justice Thomas’s jurisprudence, it is clear that the Justice is deeply influenced by his life experiences when deciding questions that directly implicate race.\textsuperscript{363} For example, one scholar Professor Scott Gerber, who argues that Justice Thomas conceives of civil rights as an individual rather than a group concern,\textsuperscript{364} has maintained that Thomas changes his approach in deciding “race” cases by shifting from a conservative originalist approach on civil liberties and federalism cases\textsuperscript{365} to one of a liberal originalist\textsuperscript{366} on civil rights cases.\textsuperscript{367}

Indeed, the influence of race and racial identity was most recently and prominently witnessed during oral arguments and in Justice Thomas’s dissent in \textit{Virginia v. Black},\textsuperscript{368} a case concerning the constitutionality of a Virginia statute that made it “unlawful for any person or persons with the intent of intimidating any person or group of persons, to burn, or cause to be burned, a cross on the property of another, a highway or other public place.”\textsuperscript{369} In that case, Justice Thomas broke with his long-standing

\begin{footnotesize}
\begin{enumerate}
\item[362] Cf. Sandra Day O’Connor, \textit{Thurgood Marshall: The Influence of a Raconteur}, 44 \textsc{Stan. L. Rev.} 1217, 1217–20 (1992) (“Like most of my counterparts who grew up in the Southwest in the 1930s and 1940s, I had not been personally exposed to racial tensions before \textit{Brown} . . . . But as I listened that day to Justice Marshall talk eloquently to the media about the social stigmas and lost opportunities suffered by African American children in state-imposed segregated school, my awareness of race-based disparities deepened. I did not, could not, know it then, but the man who would, as a lawyer and jurist, captivate the nation would also, as colleague and friend, profoundly influence me . . . . Occasionally, at Conference meetings, I still catch myself looking expectantly for his raised brow and his twinkling eye, hoping to hear, just once more, another story that would, by and by, perhaps change the way I see the world.”).
\item[363] See Onwuachi-Willig, \textit{supra} note 277 (manuscript at 39-47, on file with author) (detailing how Justice Thomas, much like Justice Marshall, brings his experiences as a black man to the bench).
\item[364] See \textit{Gerber, supra} note 3, at 50.
\item[365] A conservative originalist approach focuses on the framers’ intentions in deciding constitutional questions. See \textit{id.} at 193.
\item[366] A liberal originalist approach “appeals to the \textit{ideal} of equality at the heart of the Declaration of Independence.” \textit{Id.} at 193.
\item[367] See \textit{id.} at 193; see also Jagan Nicholas Ranjan, Book Review, \textit{The Politicization of} Clarence Thomas, 101 \textsc{Mich. L. Rev.} 2084, 2093 (2003) (maintaining that “Justice Thomas’s jurisprudence on race departs from the originalism that undergirds most of his jurisprudence”).
\item[368] 123 S. Ct. 1536 (2002).
\item[369] \textsc{Va. Code Ann.} § 18.2–423 (Michie 1996).
\end{enumerate}
\end{footnotesize}
practice of remaining silent during oral arguments to speak “in a voice of color in analyzing the harm caused by cross burning.” Justice Thomas’s exchange with the attorney from the Department of Justice, who was arguing in favor of the constitutionality of the Virginia statute, was as follows:

QUESTION: Mr. Dreeben, aren’t you understating the—the effects of—the burning cross? This statute was passed in what year?

MR. DREEBEN: 1952 originally.

QUESTION: Now, it’s my understanding that we had almost 100 years of lynching and activity in the South by the Knights of Camellia and—and the Ku Klux Klan, and this was a reign of terror and the cross was a symbol of that reign of terror. Was—isn’t that significantly greater than intimidation or a threat?

MR. DREEBEN: Well, I think they’re coextensive, Justice Thomas, because it is—

QUESTION: Well, my fear is, Mr. Dreeben, that you’re actually understating the symbolism on—and the effect of the cross, the burning cross. I—I indicated, I think, in the Ohio case that the cross was not a religious symbol and that it has—it was intended to have a virulent effect. And I—I think that what you’re attempting to do is to fit this into our jurisprudence rather than stating more clearly what the cross was intended to accomplish and, indeed, that it is unlike any symbol in our society.

---

370 Dahlia Lithwick, Personal Truths and Legal Fictions, N.Y. Times, Dec. 17, 2002, at A35 (noting that Justice Thomas “speaks only four or fives times a year, less often than most of his colleagues speak during an average morning”).

MR. DREEBEN: Well, I don’t mean to understate it, and I entirely agree with Your Honor’s description of how the cross has been used as an instrument of intimidation against minorities in this country. That has justified 14 States in treating it as a distinctive—

QUESTION: Well, it’s—it’s actually more than minorities. There’s certain groups. And I—I just—my fear is that the—there was no other purpose to the cross. There was no communication of a particular message. It was intended to cause fear—

MR. DREEBEN: It—

QUESTION: —and to terrorize a population.

As this colloquy demonstrates, for Justice Thomas, the burning of a cross with the intent to intimidate contained no expressive value but rather was conduct not subject to a First Amendment analysis, because its history and use in society had left it with no other cultural meaning but “lawlessness” and a “well-grounded fear of physical violence” for its victims. It was Justice Thomas’s race and experiences with racism as a black man growing up in the segregated South that shaped his view of a burning cross, and in turn, helped to shape those of his colleagues on the bench.

---

373 Black, 123 S. Ct. at 1564 (“After the mother saw the burning cross, she was crying on her knees in the living room. [She] felt feelings of frustration and intimidation and feared for her husband’s life. She testified what the burning cross symbolized to her as a black American: ‘murder, hanging, rape, lynching. Just about anything bad that you can name. It is the worst thing that can happen to a person’ Mr. Heisser told the probation officer that at the time of the occurrence, if the family did not leave, he believed someone would return to commit murder. . . . Seven months after the incident, the family still lived in fear. . . . This is a reaction reasonably to be anticipated from this criminal conduct.”).

374 See Onwuachi-Willig, supra note 277 (manuscript at 44-47, on file with the author) (discussing the impact of Justice Thomas’s statements during oral arguments). In the end, the majority in Black rejected Justice Thomas’s position that there was no need
Moreover, it is this same influence of race that separates Justice Thomas’s jurisprudence from that of Justice Scalia, Justice Thomas’s alleged “puppeteer.” Although Justice Scalia and Justice Thomas both adhere to principles of formal equality, Justice Thomas’s support of the principle has a clearly raced component to it in that it, much like his conservatism in general, stems from his blackness—from his view that Blacks can be protected only if they are treated exactly the same as opposed to Justice Scalia’s view that all individuals should be treated exactly the same for reasons of evenhandedness alone. For example, Justice Thomas’s analysis of a need for colorblind admissions in his dissent in Grutter was vastly different from that of Justice Scalia in the decision. While Justice Scalia’s dissent centered on what he believed to analyze the Virginia statute under any First Amendment tests because cross burning constituted conduct, not expression. Id. at 1547-49. But while the majority rejected Justice Thomas’s analysis on the statute and held that the prima facie provision within the cross burning statute was facially unconstitutional, it did hold that the state could outlaw cross burning that was carried out with the intent to intimidate because the practice was a “particularly virulent form of intimidation.” Id. at 1549. Indeed, many have argued that Justice Thomas’s words during oral argument were critical to shaping the majority’s analysis of the case, which was, in many ways, contrary to the approach adopted by the Court in R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul, 505 U.S. 377 (1992), where the Court held that the banning of certain symbolic conduct, including cross burning, when done with knowledge that it would arouse “anger, alarm, or resentment in others on the basis of race, color, creed, religion or gender” was unconstitutional. See RAV, 505 U.S. at 380; see also Charles, supra note 371, at 41-44 (arguing that other members of the court deferred to Justice Thomas’s concept regarding the harms of cross-burning “[b]ecause Justice Thomas—an African-American colleague, a conservative, raised in the south, a victim of racism—possesses epistemic authority and commands epistemic deference”); Lithwick, supra note 370, at A35 (“But with his personal narrative, Justice Thomas changed the terms of the legal debate. After he spoke, members of the court took turns characterizing burning crosses as uniquely threatening symbolic speech. . . .”); see also Edward Lazarus, Making Sense of Thomas’ Cross Burning Remarks and First Amendment Law (acknowledging that “the power of Thomas’s verbal assault on cross burning, its authenticity and historical irrefutability derived directly from his identity and perspective as the Court’s only African-American justice.”), available in http://www.cnn.com/2002/LAW/12/26/findlaw.analysis.lazarus.Thomas.

375 See Foskett, supra note 179, at 2 (“Liberal pundits like to say that the Court’s black justice simply obeys Justice Antonin Scalia, as if, Thomas joked, ‘he was suddenly my master up here.’”).

376 It also highly differed from that of Justice Rehnquist, whose dissent focused on the notion of “critical mass,” contending that the law school’s program is nothing more than an effort to achieve racial balancing. See Grutter, 123 S. Ct. at 2368 (Rehnquist, J., to be inherent unfairness to non-minority individuals who did not receive racial preferences and what he argued was the law school’s inappropriate use of racial discrimination “to convey generic lessons in socialization and good citizenship.” Justice Thomas’s dissent focused primarily on what he perceived as affirmative action’s damaging effects to individual Blacks, including what he referred to as resulting stigma by Whites who perceive affirmative action beneficiaries as inferior and affirmative action’s unintended validation of traditional standards of merit, in particular the LSAT, that work to disproportionately exclude certain minorities. In fact, it was Justice Scalia who joined all parts of Justice Thomas’s dissent and concurrence, specifically highlighting the part of Justice Thomas’s dissent that questioned the University of Michigan’s use of traditional standards of merit to maintain its elite status, an offshoot of a critique that critical race scholars have consistently made in the past. Like Justice Thomas, Justice Scalia was convinced “that the allegedly “compelling state interest” at issue here is not the incremental “educational benefit” that emanates from the fabled “critical mass” of minority students, but rather Michigan’s interest in maintaining a dissenting) (“But the correlation between the percentage of the Law School’s pool of applicants who are members of the three minority groups and the percentage of the admitted applicants who are members of these same groups is far too precise to be dismissed as merely the result of the school paying ‘some attention to [the] numbers.’ As the tables below show, from 1995 through 2000 the percentage of admitted applicants who were members of these minority groups closely tracked the percentage of individuals in the school’s applicant pool who were from the same groups.”).

377 See id. at 2349 (Scalia, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (emphasis added) (sarcastically asserting that “[t]he nonminority individuals who are deprived of a legal education, a civil service job, or any job at all by reason of their skin color will surely understand”); see also Chander, supra note 100, at 120 n.292 (highlighting that “Justice Scalia’s reference to the ‘nonminority individual’ is incorrect”, as “affirmative action programs often exclude some racial minority groups—principally Asians—from their benefits”).

378 Id. at 2349 (Scalia, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).

379 See id. at 2350-65 (Thomas, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).

380 See, e.g., Richard Delgado, Official Elitism of Institutional Self Interest? 10 Reasons Why U.C. Davis Should Abandon the LSAT (And Why Other Good Law Schools Should Follow Suit), 34 U.C. DAVIS L. REV. 593, 600-13 (2001) (explaining how standardized tests, such as the LSAT, are not good predictors of performance and highly correlate with wealth); Richard Delgado, Rodrigo’s Tenth Chronicle: Merit and Affirmative Action, 83 GEO. L.J. 1711,1730-42 (1995) (deconstructing the myth of objective merit and how it disadvantages minorities).
“prestige” law school whose normal admissions standards disproportionately exclude blacks and other minorities.” 381

Second, criticisms of Justice Thomas’s jurisprudence as lacking all independent thought, even in the face of clearly raced and distinct jurisprudence on certain issues, demonstrate the intensity of the stereotype of black incompetence and dependency. 382 Why view Justice Thomas’s voting record as evidence that he is a slave to Justice Scalia and not view Justice Ginsburg’s voting record as evidence that she is a clone of Justice Souter or Justice Souter’s voting record as evidence that he is a clone of Justice Stevens or even Justice O’Connor’s voting record as evidence that she is a clone? 383 Given the actual numbers regarding the voting relationships between judges, the only answer can be race, or more so, the stereotype of black dependency and inferiority. 384 After all, the most recent statistics of the Justices’ voting relationships indicate that the aforementioned pair of Justices have agreed in full on a greater percentage of cases than Justices Thomas and Scalia, with Justice Ginsburg agreeing in full with Justice Souter 85% of the time, Justice Souter agreeing with Justice Stevens 77% of the time, and Justice O’Connor agreeing in full with Chief Justice Rehnquist 79% of the time while Justice Thomas and Justice Scalia agreed in full only 73% of the time. 385

Justice Thomas (or one of his black conservative counterparts) might argue that this difference in perceptions of pairs of judges is, in part, due to the ill use of affirmative action and the damaging effect that affirmative action has on Whites’ views regarding the competency of minorities and women. As Justice Thomas remarked in Adarand, “These programs stamp minorities with the badge of inferiority.” 386 Indeed, as some scholars have noted, Justice Thomas’s reference to this claimed 381 Id. (Scalia, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).

383 See supra note 20 and accompanying text.
384 See GERBER, supra note 3, at 32 (acknowledging how Justice Thomas’s race has certainly played a part in how he has been assessed).
386 Adarand, 515 U.S. at 241. effect of affirmative action was almost personal in Grutter.  \(^{387}\)

Justice Thomas’s argument about the stigma caused by affirmative action, however, has less force when viewed along with similar criticisms of Justice Marshall, whose life, politics, and jurisprudence stand in stark contrast to Justice Thomas’s.  \(^{388}\) The manner in which Justice Marshall was regarded as “intellectually inferior” cannot be attributed to affirmative action, but instead to the stigma that automatically attaches to Blacks in our society.  \(^{389}\) Unlike for Justice Thomas,  \(^{390}\) there is absolutely nothing to indicate that Justice Marshall was ever a beneficiary of affirmative action. To begin, affirmative action clearly did not exist when Marshall was applying to law school. Moreover, Justice Marshall attended a then all-black law school, Howard University School of Law, where he graduated first in his class.  \(^{391}\) Additionally, Justice Marshall’s record as an attorney was unlike most other Justices of the Supreme Court, having won case after case before the Court prior to his appointment. Had Justice Marshall done nothing more than win his twenty-nine cases before joining the Supreme Court, one simply could not deny that he was an intellectual force in the legal arena. Yet, he has still been the subject of the same disparaging comments regarding alleged \(^{387}\) See Guinier, supra note 108, at 181 (guessing that Justice Thomas perhaps had a personal axe to grind in Grutter); Maureen Dowd, Could Thomas Be Right?, N.Y. TIMES, June 25, 2003, at 25 (Justice Thomas’s dissent in Grutter is a clinical study of a man who has been drive barking mad by the beneficial treatment he has received. It’s poignant really. It drives him crazy that people think he is where he is because of his race, but he is where he is because of his race.”).

\(^{388}\) See Onwuachi-Willig, supra note 277 (manuscript at 47-52, on file with author) (describing the differences in Justice Marshall’s and Justice Thomas’s jurisprudence on issues of crime and affirmative action); see also Note, Lasting Stigma, supra note 21, at 1334–36 (arguing that Justice Thomas’s conservative jurisprudence is in part due to his attempts to distinguish himself from Justice Marshall).

\(^{389}\) See Onwuachi-Willig, supra note 277 (manuscript at 61-63, on file with author) (describing the stigma caused by white supremacist beliefs upon which this country was founded); cf. Guinier, supra note 108, at 186-87, 190 (describing how racism is linked to stigma and helps to explain “why legacy preferences, which account for a larger percentage of admissions at selective colleges than do racial or ethnic factor, do not generate the same ‘stigma’”).

\(^{390}\) See Onwuachi-Willig, supra note 277 (manuscript at 1-9, on file with author) (discussing how Justice Thomas may be considered a beneficiary of affirmative action); Justice Clarence Thomas, A Classic Example of an Affirmative Action Baby, J. BLACKS HIGHER. EDUC., Jan., 31, 1998, at 35 (same).

\(^{391}\) See supra note 12.
dependency on another Justice and a lack of intellectual power. When denigrations of Justices Marshall and Thomas are viewed side by side, it becomes clear that stigma of black incompetence and inferiority existed long before affirmative action and that this stigma is likely to attach to the story of any black justice for a long time to come.

Most of all, what Justice Thomas’s story may teaches us is that the black community’s (or even more broadly, the liberal community’s) conception of blackness or “black voice” is far too limited. The fact that a black individual holds views in stark contrast with those of the majority of black community (or even those that are perceived as harmful to the black community) does not make his or her views or voice any less “black” (so long as there is expressed concern for the black community) or make his or her concern for black people any less sincere. In fact, Justice Thomas’s voice is “raced” in a way that exhibits significant concern for black people. For example, his vehement support for school choice (as opposed to integration), his opposition to leniency for criminal defendants, and his stance on affirmative action are all deeply grounded in such concern, in particular, a concern that current policies are simply band-aid solutions to festering problems in the black community, such as 392 In a sense, the lesson from Justice Thomas’s life can be likened to the one learned by Chantel Mitchell in JUST ANOTHER GIRL ON THE I.R.T. (Miramax Films 1993), the movie for which the title of this Article was inspired. In the movie, Chantel, the smartest girl in her school who sees herself as different, ultimately becomes pregnant and has her plans derailed. For Chantel, the lesson is difficult: put one’s self in the shoes of many less fortunate girls—pregnant, unmarried, broke and without a high school education—and see how smart one is. This movie shows us that no matter how smart a person is or how different he or she views himself or herself, he or she is still vulnerable in this world without some means of protection.

393 See Kennedy, supra 12 (manuscript at 14-22, on file with author) (discussing the use of terms such as “sellout” in defining acceptable boundaries in the black community).

394 See Kennedy, supra 12 (manuscript at 18-26, on file with author) (explaining the dangers of misidentifying so-called traitors to the race); see also Ranjan, supra note 367, at 2093 (describing Thomas as “a black man who cares about his race”). But see Gerber, supra note 3, at 18-19 (quotations omitted) (describing one writer as stating that “Thomas and his supporters are not politically black and have no right . . . to change the political standard”); George Curry, Editor’s Note: We Were Too Kind,” EMERGE, Nov. 1996 (“[O]ur latest depiction [of Justice Thomas on the cover as a lawn jockey] is too compassionate for a person who has done so much to turn back the back the clock on civil rights, all the way back to the pre-Civil War lawn jockey days”).
failing schools and black on black crime. Indeed, as I was researching and learning about black conservative ideology, I found myself (surprisingly) nodding in agreement with some of its concepts and understandings about the issues facing the black community, even though I disagreed with the ultimate route proposed for addressing these problems. Perhaps, this is Justice Thomas’s most significant lesson for us all, with his seemingly contradictory “black nationalist” and “Reagan conservative” views: not only that the voice of the black conservative can be “raced” in a way that the voice of the white conservative is not, but that the rift between the black conservative and black liberal is not so wide after all. Perhaps, black 395 See Tushnet, Black Nationalism, supra note 243, at 330 (describing how Justice Thomas’s opinions on education and Blacks “are concerned with ensuring that public policy address real problems in education for African-Americans: failing inner-city schools, the relative underperformance of black males, and the like).

---

396 See Tushnet, Black Nationalism, supra note 243, at 335-39 (describing the tensions between Justice Thomas’s seeming black nationalist views and his devotion to individualism).
397 See, e.g., Derrick Bell, Space Traders, in DERRICK BELL, FACES AT THE BOTTOM OF THE WELL: THE PERMANENCE OF RACISM 166-68 (1992). Professor Bell makes this point in clear in his portrayal of the black conservative economist Gleason Golightly in Space Traders when Golightly states to his white conservative counterparts, who are willing to trade in black Americans in exchange for an enormous wealth of gold and fuel:

I have supported this administration’s policies that have led to the repeal of some civil rights laws, to invalidation of most affirmative action programs, and to severe reduction in appropriations for public assistance. To put it mildly, the positions of mine that have received a great deal of media attention, have not been well received in African-American communities. Even so, I have been willing to be a ‘good soldier’ for the Party even though I am condemned as an Uncle Tom by my people. I sincerely believe that black people needed to stand up on their own feet, free of special protection provided by civil rights laws, the suffocating burden of welfare checks, and the stigmatizing influence of affirmative action programs. In helping you undermine these policies, I realized that your reasons for doing so differed from mine. And yet I went along.

Id. at 166-67 (emphasis added).
398 See Richard Delgado, supra note 58 at 1548-49 (arguing that, in some instances, black critiques from the left and the right converge and those interested in civil rights should take note when such convergence occurs).
conservatives and black liberals would both benefit from listening to each other and taking the other group’s concerns seriously. After all, in spite of everything, Justice Thomas appears to be just another brother on the Supreme Court.

\[399\] See Kennedy, supra 12 (manuscript at 25, on file with author) (contending that “monitoring of dissident black opinion imposes a loss of valuable information and insight”); see also Bridgeman, supra note 12 (manuscript at 3, 15, on file with author) (“I wonder if we do not duplicate some of the patterns of silencing and marginalization that we ourselves constantly struggle against when we refuse to take seriously those within our communities who view the world differently.”).